The purpose of the bill is to vest the new institution with the character of a Federal court.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that I should like to have my amendment considered first. I think that is the more appropriate order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I shall be glad to have the Senator proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 6, after the words "during good behavior", it is proposed to strike out-and shall as occasion therefor may arise and their engagements in the work of the Railroad Reorganization Court will permit, be designated and assigned by the Chief Justice of the United States for temporary service in the district court for any district or the circuit court of appeals for any circuit.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I have no particular objection to this amendment. However, I must confess that I think it would be better to leave in the language than to strike it out. In my judgment, the amendment would not affect the bill one way or the other. I am much more interested in the general principles laid down in the bill than I am in the tenure of the judges, or where they might be sent. I have no particular interest in the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, on page 1, line 6, I move to amend the bill by striking out the words "court of the United States" and inserting in lieu thereof the word

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I certainly object to that amendment, because the purpose is to make the new institution a court of the United States; and if we set it up simply as a tribunal it seems to me we would change the whole tenor of it.

What we are doing is setting up a court and providing for the appointment of judges. It seems to me that to say that "a tribunal is hereby created to be known as the Railroad Reorganization Court" would be to say to the President of the United States, "Do not appoint any judges; appoint anyone you wish."

I want to see high-class men appointed. To be frank, I want to see men appointed who have had judicial experience. I think the Senator from Missouri is doing the very thing he does not want to do. I think the amendment would have a very bad effect.

We provide in the bill that the rules of equity, as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States, shall prevail; and I think it would be very unwise from every standpoint to make this body a tribunal without making it a court of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me say very frankly to my friend, the Senator from Montana, that if this amendment is agreed to it is my purpose to follow it up with amendments divesting the tribunal of the character of a court.

Like the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borahl, who so eloquently stated the matter this afternoon, I am not in favor of the principle of creating a special court having to do with railroad reorganizations. I think that principle is objectionable from every standpoint.

If the pending amendment is adopted, I intend to follow it up by offering an amendment in lines 3 and 4, on page 2, to strike out the words "be of the rank", so as to read "who shall receive the compensation of circuit judges of the United States", rather than "who shall be of the rank and receive the compensation of circuit judges of the United States." If that amendment is agreed to, I intend to offer an amendment striking out the words "during good behavior" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "for a term of 9 years."

Mr. President, I am not willing to repeat the experience the United States had with the Commerce Court. I am not willing to have the experience of setting up a special court for a special interest which may turn out to be a national scandal. One judge might be impeached, as was Judge Archbald, and then we should have on our hands a court with the status of Federal judges who could not be disposed of except by special legislation authorizing them to be distributed among the judiciary of the United States.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. The only thing I wish to interrupt the Senator for is to suggest, in line with the amendment he has offered, that the language in line 8, "shall be a court of record", should be stricken out to carry out his own thought.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thank the Senator for the suggestion.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to ask a question. If I understand the proposal, its meaning would be to change the new office from a court into an independent executive body of some kind?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator could not more accurately have expressed the intention of my amendment, and the subsequent amendments which I intend to offer.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the Senator permit another question? Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I shall be very glad indeed to permit another question.

Mr. AUSTIN. The powers contained in the bill are judicial powers, are they not?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, it is very difficult to understand what the powers contained in the bill are. If they are judicial powers, it occurs to me that the bill should have been reported from the Judiciary Committee, of which the Senator is an honored member, and which has particular jurisdiction over such matters. If the bill has reference to judicial powers, will the Senator explain to me how the bill came to be reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I shall be glad to explain how it came about.

The bill deals with railroads; and the Committee on Interstate Commerce has been dealing with the question of railroad reorganizations. The bill pertains to railroad reorganizations. We cannot divide up every petty larceny bill that comes before the Congress of the United States and fight over it, and dispute whether it should go to the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or some other committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President-

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator asked for an answer, and I am giving it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I am shocked. My friend the Senator from Montana refers to a bill which he himself introduced and reported as a "petty larceny bill."

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is very easily shocked this afternoon.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for another question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AUSTIN. In asking this question, I am assuming that all bankruptcy matters involve proceedings in rem in a court of justice which determines property rights generally. They are always judicial proceedings, and a judicial power must be exercised in order to administer for the Congress the bankruptcy power, whether it be in the form of reorganization or in the form of a complete distribution of the property and a winding-up in liquidation.

If that assumption be correct, I ask the Senator from Missouri this question. Would not section 1 of Article III of the Constitution of the United States be a barrier to his proposal? It reads as follows:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I can answer the Senator very readily by saying that so long as there is an appeal provided to a proper judicial tribunal, no difficulty is presented. Many actions of Congress, including that which we took on yesterday in the passage of the transportation bill which was before us, contemplate action by a tribunal inferior to a court, set up by Congress, with a proper appeal to a court of competent jurisdiction. I do not think there can be any controversy on that question.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. If a proceeding in bankruptcy is a proceeding in rem, as I think we are all prepared to concede, and is therefore a judicial question, how can we clothe a mere commission or tribunal with power to deal with questions of that sort in rem, so as to provide an appeal to some court?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, it would have been very simple from a legal viewpoint if the Interstate Commerce Committee had started out with the idea in mind of providing a tribunal with advisory powers to advise the court.

Mr. BARKLEY. We are dealing with bankruptcy, reorganizations, and receiverships.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am sure the Senator from Kentucky will not deny that over a period of many years the Congress has conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission jurisdiction to deal with matters of bankruptcy, and to report them on proper occasions to the court.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. What we are doing in this bill is trying to get away from the very suggestion the Senator is making. At the present time the Interstate Commerce Commission is passing on judicial matters and legal matters. Some of the Commissioners themselves came before the committee and said they did not feel that they were in a position properly to pass upon them. So we say that the Commission shall pass upon the factual matters, and that a court shall pass upon the legal matters.

What the Senator from Missouri proposes is that the factual matters shall be passed upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and then that they shall be submitted to a tribunal which would really be another commission; and then what does he propose? He proposes that in certain instances the Commission shall have charge of and direct the Federal judges what to do; and then he proposes that by certiorari the matter may be reviewed by the United States Subreme Court.

Let me say that if the amendment should be adopted, the bill would be emasculated. We might just as well have no legislation at all as to have that provision in it. If that is what the Senator from Missouri seeks to do, let us have an understanding about it. Let us say that the railroads may go on and be run by a lot of crooked receivers and crooked trustees, and that we shall have no standards set up, and that the same old practices that have gone on in the past by the same crooked, faking lawyers will continue to go on. In some instances they were the ones who appeared before the committee, because they want their pet courts to appoint the receivers and the trustees. I am opposed to it.

The committee has made recommendations on the subject, and we have given a great deal of study to it. If the Senate wants to put the matter back in their hands and leave it there, let it be that way; but I want the Senator to understand that when he brings that about he is emasculating the bill

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Montana, with all due respect to his all-comprehensive knowledge on all subjects, which he has demonstrated here during the past 2 or 3 days, that many Senators are not willing to accept, willy-nilly, the mere declaration of his great wisdom, or the great wisdom of his committee, as concluding a subject. There are many Senators who have no more sympathy with the old and bad practices which have grown up in connection with railroad receiverships than has the Senator from Montana, who do not believe that the answer to this problem is setting up in the District of Columbia a reconstruction of the old Commerce Court to take jurisdiction of the whole United States, and to create a corps of flying judges to go around over the country as additional Federal judges.

Mr. President, since the Senator has brought up that matter, let me remind you that he says that anybody who does not accept his dictum at 5 o'clock on Friday afternoon, after a 1-day discussion of this tremendously important measure, is trying to assist the railroad holding corporations or somebody else in perpetuating a bad system. I am not willing to agree to such a statement. I listened this afternoon to the very able speech of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I listened to nearly all of the speech of the Senator from Montana, which was very far from being convincing, in behalf of this particular measure. I say that when the Senator at 5 o'clock on Friday afternoon undertakes to make it appear that Senators who desire to discuss this matter more fully, and who desire to change the character of this tribunal even if it is necessary to recast the whole bill, are undertaking to perpetuate any evils which have heretofore existed, the Senator from Montana is not being fair.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. What the Senator has just said is precisely along the lines I have been thinking.

The Senator speaks of recasting the entire bill. Without expressing an opinion as to the merits of the Senator's proposal, is it not true that if we accept the philosophy of the Senator from Missouri it will be necessary to rewrite the entire bill from cover to cover?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think that is true.

Mr. WHITE. There is hardly a page in the bill which does not in express terms refer to judges, which does not treat this tribunal as a court, as a judicial body; a body which is to have authority to issue writs and processes; a body which is to function under rules promulgated by the Supreme Court of the United States, and under its own rules made in conformity with the rules of the Supreme Court of the United States; a body from which there is to be an appeal by certiorari to the Supreme Court of the United States.

It strikes me that if the philosophy of the Senator from Missouri is accepted as sound, we shall have to rewrite the bill page by page and line by line. Is not that true?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I say very frankly to the Senator from Maine that I think to a very large extent the proposition he has enunciated is true. If the theory and the philosophy exemplified in the amendment I have just offered and in the immediate amendments which I shall offer are adopted, I think probably it will be necessary for the whole bill to be recast. I think the whole bill should be recast.

With all due respect to any committee or to the chairman of any committee of this body, I do not think they have a right to come in here with what is almost a revolutionary measure and say to us, "You must sign on the dotted line, or else you are opposed to any reform." I say it is the business of the Senate of the United States to discuss measures and to determine on the proper theory.

It so happens that I hold the theory expressed here today by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borahl]. I think the Senate ought to take that theory into consideration, and, if necessary, without any reflection whatever on the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to recommit the bill, or to go through the bill paragraph by paragraph and amend it in accordance with what may be a contrary but better theory. I am perfectly frank to say that to the Senator.

Mr. WHITE and Mr. MINTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will not the Senator agree that it would be an utterly impossible task to rewrite this bill on the floor of the Senate, section by section, paragraph by paragraph, and line by line?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am perfectly frank to admit to the Senator from Maine that I think it would be a very difficult task. Nevertheless, when I consider that the whole theory and philosophy of a bill are wrong—as I consider that this bill establishing a new circuit court of appeals is wrong—I think it is the duty of the Senate, if necessary, either to take the time to consider it paragraph by paragraph, or to commit it to a proper committee to make changes in accordance with the views of the majority of the Senate.

I do not assume that I represent the view of the majority of the Senate in this matter. I am simply expressing my own view. I am offering, for the purpose of getting a vote on it, an amendment which expresses my own view, and I happen to know that it expresses the view of a good many other persons.

Let me say to my friend from Montana that when I offer that amendment I am not representing any railroads. I have had no suggestion from any railroads. I am simply opposed to establishing a new court. I was particularly opposed to the bill as it was reported to the Senate when it contained the provision for appointing several roving judges. That provision has been corrected by the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Adams], which was just agreed to; but I am still just as much opposed as ever to creating a new court in the District of Columbia for the purpose of taking over the jurisdiction of courts in other parts of the country when I do not think it is necessary.

If it be true, as was suggested a while ago, that there are certain district courts whose handling of receiverships of railroad or other matters is reprehensible, I submit that a method is provided by the Constitution of the United States for dealing with them, and that if in such cases the present method is too cumbersome it is the right of the Congress to submit a constitutional amendment for the purpose of simplifying that process; but I still hold that that is no justification for the creation of a new and unnecessary court in the District of

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I desire to say just one word, and that is that if the pending amendment is adopted it will emasculate the bill, and it will have to be rewritten.

There is not anything new in the suggestions which have been made by my friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. Every one of these arguments was presented to the committee. Every one of them was very ably presented by lawyers representing trustees. Every one of them was presented before the committee for a considerable period of time by persons representing different trustees and referees

They stated that we should not take this jurisdiction away from the local courts, but it is being taken from the local courts, whereas, of course, the railroads are centered in particular cities, in New York, or Chicago, or St. Louis, or some other place.

I have no fight with the lawyers who desire to keep the business in their particular districts, but I think the Senate has to look at this question not from a local standpoint, not from the standpoint of some lawyer in St. Louis, or in Chicago, or Boston, or New York, or Butte, Mont.; we have to look at it from the standpoint of the national interest; we have to look at it from the standpoint of the hundreds of thousands of investors in the railroads; we have to look at it from the standpoint of the good of the people, because the railroad industry is one of the industries of first magnitude in this country, and one-third of the roads are in the hands of the receivers or are in bankruptcy, and many of them are tottering on the brink.

Many of those opposed to the bill have been hanging around our committee. They have talked with us privately; they have advanced exactly the same arguments, both in the committee and outside of the committee, and I know where the arguments emanate; and I say that without reflection upon anyone at all. But I know the people who are opposed to the bill, and I know what their interests are.

I know why they are opposed to it.

There was not a single vote in the committee adverse to the bill, and it was given most careful consideration. I do not say that the Committee on Interstate Commerce has all the wisdom with reference to this matter; I certainly know I have not. Undoubtedly the Senator from Missouri knows much more about the problem than I do. I do not claim to be an expert on it. I do know, however, that we listened to impartial witnesses, many who are employed in the Government service, and who have given great consideration to this subject, representing institutions which have the Government's money invested in them to the extent of millions of dollars, institutions which are vitally interested in the proposed legislation from the standpoint of the Government and from the standpoint of the public, as distinguished from the special pleaders who come before the committee. These institutions of the Government favor the legislation, and favor it in its present form. I submit that it ought to be passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am wondering about one feature of the bill. If we establish a separate system of courts for railroads, will not the next step be to establish a separate system of courts for banks, and for insurance companies, and for other large industries or aggregations of industries? If we do this, should we not establish separate courts for agriculture and other lines of endeavor?

I was in the House of Representatives when Judge Archbald was impeached, and I remember the many questions which came up about our having a Commerce Court. It was then contended, along the line the Senator is now arguing, that a Commerce Court would be of tremendous advantage to the commerce of the country, that it would be of advantage to have judges who were particularly interested in commerce, and had had experience in such matters, that it would be for the benefit of the country. It was tried and it was found wanting. I am wondering where we will land if we undertake to furnish courts for particular interests. I think our whole system is based upon a system of courts.

I agree entirely with my distinguished friend, the Senator from Vermont, in his statement. I do not think the Constitution ever intended that we should have a system of courts for each particular interest in the country and that they could take their problems to special courts set up specifically for them. I think the courts should extend their activities to all kinds of cases. That is merely my view. I should like to hear the Senator from Montana discuss the

Mr. WHEELER. The only reason why this court is to be set up at this time is that there is a railroad problem before the country, as everyone recognizes.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. WHEELER. I should like to answer the question of the Senator from Tennessee, but I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Within the last few years we have had some other bankruptcy problems which were even greater than the railroad problem. Suppose we set up a bankruptcy court for the moving-picture business, which has gone through more bankruptcies perhaps, than has any other one line of industry in the country. Suppose we set up another court to deal with section 77B, which is the reorganization section. Are we to set up a court for every one of those things? If we do, we might just as well commence setting up courts promiscuously.

Mr. WHEELER. I can answer both questions at the same time, because they refer to identically the same thing.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask another question so that he can answer all three questions at the same time?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.
Mr. McKELLAR. I apologize to the Senator, to begin with, for not having examined the bill as I should have examined it, but under "Powers of court" it is stated that the court "shall have and may exercise any and all of the powers of a district court of the United States." That is a pretty large jurisdiction to confer upon this special court. That is another reason why a question arises in my mind about it.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me explain that. At the very beginning it is provided:

In all proceedings within its jurisdiction the Railroad Reorganization Court, and subject to the provisions of this act, the judges thereof, shall have and may exercise any and all of the powers of a district court of the United States.

That is because they are to try a special type of cases between different litigants involving railroad equities.

In answer to the other questions, let me say that it has been stated that we are setting up a special court. Yes; but we have set up other special courts. We have set up the Court of Claims, which is a special court. We have set up other special courts.

The court to which the Senator from Tennessee referred awhile ago, upon which Judge Archbald sat, had conferred upon it powers which were not of a judicial character. We conferred upon it the power to hear rate cases de novo. We conferred jurisdiction on that court to determine economic questions as applied to rates. It broke down because we gave it that tremendous power.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator stated that we had set up other courts, and he mentioned the Court of Claims.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Court of Claims does not deal with any specific industry exclusively. The Court of Claims is an intermediary because of the constitutional provision that the Government cannot be sued except as the Government sees fit to establish an agency through which it may be

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct, but we have set up other special courts.

Mr. McCARRAN. We set up one special court, and we tore it down.

Mr. WHEELER. We have set up the Customs Court, a court to deal specifically with the question of customs.

Mr. McCARRAN. Will the Senator mention one court that was set up for one particular industry specifically?

Mr. WHEELER. We set up the Court of Customs for a particular line of business, to deal with questions pertaining to customs. One might just as well ask why we set up the Customs Court to deal specifically with customs. Why should not that matter have gone to any Federal court? There is just as much reason for setting up the court proposed in the pending bill as there was for setting up any other court.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt again?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator admitted just a moment ago that there was a special and constitutional reason for setting up the Court of Claims.

Mr. WHEELER. No.

Mr. McCARRAN. But that did not deal with a specific industry. It dealt with every claim against the Government. Will the Senator kindly recur to my question and name one court that was set up to deal with one specific industry?

Mr. WHEELER. It was not necessary to set up the Court of Claims in order to permit the Government of the United States to be sued. That jurisdiction could have been placed in any court of the United States. But we did set up a particular court to deal with a particular set of facts and a particular set of circumstances. We did the same thing in the case of other special courts which we set up.

I will give the Senate the real argument that was made to me and to the committee. Men came and said to me privately, and have also said in the committee, "Let us be frank about the issue. We will tell you what we are afraid of. We do not want the President of the United States to appoint

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator from Montana has a very apt way of setting up straw men and then tearing down his own straw men. I admire that procedure. It is a very apt way of presenting the case. But I will say that I have not heard that argument made. I know that some agency must appoint judges, and I have no objection to the President of the United States making the appointments.

Mr. WHEELER. I appreciate that the Senator does not have any objection to that method of appointment. I wish to say to the Senator that some lawyers came to me privately and made the statement-and one of them did so on the witness stand-"There is one thing we do not like about it. If you could take the appointing power away from the President of the United States and give it to the Chief Justice. then we would be satisfied with the membership of the court."

I appreciate that the Senator did not know anything about all that, but I say to him that that was the real opposition which was made before the Interstate Commerce Committee when the subject was discussed.

Mr. McCARRAN. That may be true; but it was entirely without the knowledge of some Senators.

Mr. WHEELER. I appreciate that.

Mr. McCARRAN. Every now and then the able Senator from Montana in his argument uses the expression, "It had been said to me." It may have been said to the able Sena-

Mr. WHEELER. It was said to the committee.

Mr. McCARRAN. It may have been said to the committee, but the Senate is dealing with the problem here as best it may, and I say to the Senator that I realize that some agency would naturally appoint the judges, and I have no objection to the method of appointment. I do not raise that question here lest perchance my opposition to the bill, against which I shall vote, might perhaps be attributed to something other than what appears in the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is entitled to his own judgment. I stated what the testimony before the committee showed, and what lawyers said privately to members of the committee, and it was a notorious fact that that was the case.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to assure the Senate that I do not entertain any such objection as the one just referred to, and I wish to make it further certain that I do not have the slightest interest in any receiver or receivership. I hold in detestation certain receivers of whom we have heard so much in recent years, who have gotten out of corporations exorbitant fees to which they were not entitled, and I think it is most commendable to try to pass legislation which will. do away with such a system.

On the other hand, setting up of a court for a particular class, for a particular industry, for a particular activity among our people, is something that is so foreign and so surprising to me that my breath is taken away by it. Really I do not know sufficient about it. I am frank to tell the Senator that I had not examined the matter until I came into the Chamber this afternoon.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask a question?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes. Mr. McCARRAN. Is it not true that under the provisions of the bill the court to be set up will appoint receivers, referees, masters in chancery, and the like?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. So that the system of which the Senator from Tennessee makes mention, which we all deprecate, which we would all reform if we could, would exist under another form.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to the fact that I have pointed out repeatedly on the floor of the Senate what was before the Interstate Commerce Committee and what was before other committees of the Congress. Evidence concerning railroad receiverships was presented not only to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, but to the special committee appointed by the Congress, upon which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] was a member, the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] was a member, and other Senators were members. Also the matter was presented to the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate.

The evidence shows that judges appoint receivers. This morning I called attention to the fact that in one case the receivership of a railroad had lasted for 34 solid years.

It has been suggested that the proper procedure in case of abuse would be to impeach the judge. The judge cannot be impeached unless facts warranting impeachment are presented. Others have said, "Amend the Constitution so that the necessary action can be more easily taken."

What is going to happen to the reorganizations? We studied the matter in connection with the committee's experts, and the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission. We received advice from the S. E. C. We received advice from the legal department of the R. F. C. and from the Interstate Commerce Commission. We and they tried to work out some satisfactory provision.

I appreciate the fact that there may be in the minds of some a plan for a better way of doing what we seek to accomplish, but what we have presented is the result of the combined judgment of those who have studied the matter, representatives of the S. E. C., of the R. F. C., and of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Chairman Jones, of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, testified before the committee. Commissioners Splawn and Eastman testified before the committee. The Committee of Three appointed by the President last year studied the problem. The Committee of Six, consisting of three members representing the railroads and three members representing the brotherhoods, endorsed

Those who appeared against the proposal were whom? They were the lawyers representing the trustees. Some of those trustees called themselves independent trustees for the Van Sweringen interests. Really, they were put in there by the Van Sweringens.

Mr. President, I know that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCarran] is just as sincerely interested in seeing the problem solved as is any other Member of the Senate. If the proposed legislation is enacted, and the standards contained in it are set up, and the court which is established upholds those standards, I believe the country will find that when a railroad comes out of reorganization it will have a proper capital structure, and the water will have been taken out of it. The bill seeks to provide a proper capital structure.

In my judgment, the bill, if passed, will be one of the most constructive pieces of legislation relating to railroad reorganization that has been put on the statute books during this session of Congress, or any other session of Congress.

I appreciate that some persons do not like it and do not want it. They do not like some of the standards set up in the bill. However, I say that the people of the country, the farmers who have to pay the freight, the workers along the lines, and the shippers from one end of the country to the other, will appreciate this legislation because it is in the interest of the great mass of the shippers of the country, in the interest of the workers, and in the interest of all classes of honest citizens.

The bill is not in the interest of the lawyers who represent the receivers. It is not in the interest of the trustees who make a perpetual business out of being trustees for one railroad and then another, just as fast as the judge can finish up one and appoint them to another. No; it is not in their interest, and they are opposing it. They have been before the committee opposing it. They are opposed to it, and their lawyers are opposed to it. But I say that the great mass of the people of the country want to see the railroads put upon a financial basis under which they can earn dividends and fixed charges without having to pay exorbitant rates on bonds and stocks when they cannot possibly earn the interest upon the bonds or pay dividends unless railroad rates are raised to the people of the country.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator; but either before he concludes or after he concludes I wish to make a few remarks on his last few statements.

Mr. WHEELER. I have concluded. I have said all I wish to say.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in the first place, the Senator has uttered one of the strongest indictments of the court system of America that has been uttered on the floor of the Senate in many years. In order to give cogency to the argument of the able Senator from Montana, the courts of America must be most corrupt and incapable. They cannot be otherwise looked upon. Condemnation must be hurled against someone who now occupies a judicial office because he has not carried out that which it is claimed might be carried out under the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not care whether it be called condemnation or not. I say that, either through inefficiency or lack of appreciation of their real duties, some of the judges have failed to discharge their duties. No Senator appreciates and believes in the American system of jurisprudence more than I do, and no one wants to fight to preserve it more than I do. I am asking for the reorganization court so as to take such matters away from inexperienced judges and judges who have shown their lack of interest.

The special court will make a study and business of what? Not of deciding cases in favor of railroads. There seems to be a misconception about the bill. The court is to decide as between the equity holders. So it will not be a railroad court. It will simply decide between the different equity holders.

Mr. McCARRAN. Of course the Senator will admit that the court will not relieve or do away with the unhappy situation which grew out of the investigation which disclosed the conditions in the Van Sweringen case.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes! Let me say to the Senator— Mr. McCARRAN. How would it do it? That is a thing of the past.

Mr. WHEELER. No.

Mr. McCARRAN. Then the new court is to pick up that which has already been passed upon by the courts?

Mr. WHEELER. No.

Mr. McCARRAN. There is no such provision in the bill. In fact, the bill specifically declares against that very thing.

The Senator mentions a receivership which has lasted for some 30 years. Does the Senator say that the court set up under the provisions of the bill would do away with that receivership?

Mr. WHEELER. I certainly do.

Mr. McCARRAN. If that be true, we have to write off the law of the country.

Mr. WHEELER. I say that the court will speed up and bring to a conclusion such cases rather than let them drag on.

The Senator spoke of the Van Sweringen case. I am glad he did. What we are seeking to do through the reorganization court is to prevent the Van Sweringens or the Alleghany Corporation from keeping their hold on the Missouri Pacific and other roads—through what? Through holding a lot of worthless stock.

Mr. McCARRAN. I want to understand the Senator. I hope I may have a clear conception of the bill. Does the Senator mean that the new institution that is to be set up in the name of a court will do away with all the former court proceedings?

Mr. WHEELER. No.

Mr. McCARRAN. Or that it will entirely relieve the corruption which the Senator and his committee found in the Van Sweringen case?

Mr. WHEELER. There will be other legislation. If the bill is enacted into law and the standards set up in the bill are followed for the reorganization of the Van Sweringen railroads, the great Van Sweringen empire will be taken out of the control of the Alleghany Corporation, which has peddled, for a mere pittance, the stock and the control of thousands of miles of American railroads.

Mr. McCARRAN. Does the Senator say that the courts of America today are incapable of accomplishing the same result?

Mr. WHEELER. No; but the standards of today, under which the roads are being reorganized, permit such things to be done; and we are seeking to remedy the situation by this bill. The situation will be remedied if the bill passes.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the bill being presented in the manner in which it is presented to the Senate, I am constrained to vote against it. I shall vote against it.

Only one thing pertaining to the bill enlists my especial attention, and that is its authorship. The ability of the author was the thing which yesterday put through a bill which had some serious objections to it, which some of us hope will be worked out. However, I do not believe that for 2 days in succession the able author of the bill should be so admired that at 5:30 in the afternoon a bill which has been considered for only a day, and which sets up a new judicial system to deal with the very lifeblood of America, should go through on a viva voce vote. I am not ready to vote in that manner, and I hope other Senators may look more deeply into the bill before they finally conclude to vote for it.

I should like to support the bill for two reasons: First, because I have a great admiration for the outstanding member of the minority who comes forward supporting the bill. I refer to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin]. Second, because of my admiration of the ability of the Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler]. However, I realize that we are setting up a new system which neither the Senator from Vermont nor the Senator from Montana fully appreciates. I think the Senate should at least have time for consideration.

Are we setting up a system which will do away with receiverships? The Senator says "no." So all the corruption that has grown into receiverships will be carried on if the bill becomes a law. Are we doing away with the system under which masters in chancery or other equity officers are appointed by courts having equity jurisdiction? The Senator naturally says "no." If that be the case, where is the assurance in the new set-up that it will be better than the old set-up which we have had and admired for so long?

Mr. President, if the amendment must be voted on at this time, I shall call for a quorum. If the matter goes over, some of us may want to study and discuss it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have no intention of trying to hold the Senate in session tonight long enough to vote on the bill, or even the pending amendment. I will say to the Senator that it is my purpose to move that the Senate take a recess until tomorrow.

I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his motion for just a moment?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. I hope the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Clark] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCarran] may have an opportunity during the recess to consider the amendment which is pending.

Under section 77 as it now stands, the predominant power over reorganizations under that section of the Bankruptcy Act is vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission; so much so that the Commission report in this way—I am reading from page 25 of their report:

Consequently, in section 77 the emphasis throughout was upon the Commission instead of the court, and the latter's jurisdiction was so restricted that it could not ultimately supersede the judgment of the Commission with respect to the reorganization.

They have been playing with that throughout the experience under section 77. Now something has to be done about it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will my friend yield at that point?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If that be a vice of the existing law, is not the thing to do about it to take away some of the jurisdiction from the Interstate Commerce Commission and give it back to the courts, where it belongs, instead of setting up a new and special court for a special industry?

Mr. AUSTIN. That may be a better solution than is proposed in the pending bill, but my opinion is not hastily formed. I have been at work on this question for about 3 months, and though at the beginning I approached it with the same attitude of mind that the learned Senators I am addressing have, I reluctantly came to the conclusion that probably this new court was the best solution of our problem, for we have a problem to solve.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, what the Senator from Vermont has said is correct. Let me call attention also to the fact that in section 77 we sought to take away the power of the court because of the things that had been complained of. When we enacted section 77 it was the intention of the Congress to turn over to the Commission certain power in order to get away from some of the evil practices that had been going on.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt for just a moment?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. In that respect we did not seek to take away power, but we sought to give more power, and that was the power of reorganization. We sought to give that power to the bankruptcy court.

Mr. WHEELER. No; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. McCARRAN. No; I am not mistaken. I have been through this thing time and again; but I realize that the power has been used differently.

Mr. WHEELER. What we did was to give more power to the Interstate Commerce Commission, for we said to the Interstate Commerce Commission, "You will pass not only upon the facts but upon the legal phases."

Mr. Commissioner Splawn appeared before the committee, and said that while the Commission had in its membership some very able lawyers, their other duties were such that it was almost impossible for them to pass upon the legal phases. If we send the matter back to the old courts, almost everybody I have come in contact with concedes that there are evils there that ought to be remedied. I also approached the thing reluctantly, but after hearing the witnesses I came to the conclusion that what is proposed in the bill was the only thing we could do. If the Congress does not want to do it, then it may leave the matter where it is, and let the abuses go on.

I appreciate the fact that different persons have different views from my own with reference to the matter. Perhaps I am wrong about it; but I am convinced that if we do not pass a measure of this kind we shall perpetuate some of the evils which have been going on, and I am sure we shall come back to the bill and say that it should be enacted.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I am only going to say, from the experience I have had in the Senate as a member of a special committee charged with investigating receiverships and bankruptcy matters, that section 77B was the thing that was uppermost, and we had the same proposition with reference to other industries; so, if we wanted to set up another court for those industries, we might have done so.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree with the Senator from Nevada that there are other industries and other receiverships that are in just as bad a position as those dealt with by this bill; but I say that from an economic standpoint the railroads of the country, which are in bankruptcy, capitalized at about five and a half billion dollars, or something like that, seriously affect the whole economic structure of the country. It is recognized that the railroads affect it to a greater extent than almost any other industry. They go into every section of the country. They go into Nevada, they go into Montana, they go into every other section; and when the railroads of the country are in that condition, it affects our whole economic condition.

Mr. McCARRAN. There is not any denying that. We are not denying it.

Mr. WHEELER. The only reason why we have differentiated is because we felt that there was a special problem here, and that the special problem needed special treatment because of the condition which exists at the present time.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I have been thinking about this problem. I desire to ask the Senator one question about the problem which Senators say they are trying to solve. I ask it because the courts have come in for quite a bit of criticism here this afternoon, and the impression might be given that all the courts in the country are corrupt and inefficient.

Can any judge, with the multitude of other duties which the judge has, give to the special problem the attention that a special court could give?

Mr. WHEELER. That is exactly the point. I may say that judges have said that to members of the committee, and the testimony before other committees has been that that is exactly what the courts themselves have said. I do not think the difficulty is that the courts are corrupt. There may be, here and there, a court that is corrupt; but as a general thing, I do not think the courts are corrupt. They have multitudinous other duties, and they have neglected these things and let them run along, and it has produced a bad situation.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator—and this is the last time I shall interrupt; I want to express this thought tonight, because I understand we are to have a session tomorrow—that my observation is that the reason for some of the things to which the Senator from Montana and the Senator from New Mexico have made reference is that we have not in our courts today enough presiding officers to handle the business. That fact is being disclosed before the Judiciary Committee right now, and to my certain knowledge it has been the case for the past 2 or 3

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in the light of this discussion, will the Senator from Montana submit to a mere observation?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly. Mr. BARKLEY. Much has been said here about the creation of a new court for the railroads, whereas we have not done that for any other business or industry. I do not look upon this court as one set up simply for the railroads. The railroads constitute one of the largest industries in America. Millions of persons have invested their money in the railroads. They are the arteries of commerce, and they are vital to the maintenance of our economic system. This, however, as I understand, is not a court which is set up simply for the benefit of the railroads. It is set up to deal with railroad problems for the benefit of the American people, because the railroad problem now stands out on our economic system like a sore thumb to a greater extent than any other particular industry or business problem of which we have any knowledge.

For that reason I do not think it is quite accurate to say that we are trying to set up a court for the benefit of the railroads. If the court which is established can put the railroads on a sound basis, and so readjust their financial status as to make it possible for them to operate with a profit and to render greater service to the American people. it will incidentally benefit the railroads, of course; but the benefit will inure to the whole country, and not simply to the railroads.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator look through the bill and tell me to what other industry than the railroad industry this court applies? Will he tell me any other industry in the whole bill to which it applies. except as any special court for any special industry must necessarily affect some other industry?

In other words, if this court is not a railroad court, no court affecting a special industry could possibly be a special court. Suppose we were to set up a court having to do only with such questions as might come before a court in connection with the production and sale of cotton. That would necessarily affect other persons in the United States. If we were to set up a special banking court, that necessarily would affect other persons.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that. I am not contending that the decisions of this court will not affect persons who are not particularly interested in railroads, except as a part of the transportation system of the country; but it seems to me the Senator's illustration of a cotton court or a banking court does not apply, because the problem is not comparable.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We have a considerable problem in this country having to do with, let us say, motortruck transportation.

Would the Senator be in favor of setting up a court having jurisdiction only of problems arising in connection with the motortruck industry? We have a very large problem in this country in connection with utilities. Would the Senator be in favor of setting up a court to deal with the reorganization of utility companies?

Mr. BARKLEY. If the question should be of such universality as the railroad question, we would have to consider that subject when we reached it in the light of the merits. But there is no situation in this country with respect to any other industry comparable with that of the railroads.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator asks why pick out the railroads. Why was section 77B adopted? It was for the purpose of taking care of the reorganization of the railreads.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I may say to the Senator from Montana that I voted against that.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana is mistaken. Section 77B was enacted for the purpose of giving all bankruptcy courts the right to reorganize in all lines of business.

Mr. WHEELER. We made special provision with reference to the reorganization of railroads.

Mr. McCARRAN. I understand that.

Mr. WHEELER. We picked out the railroads as a separate and independent industry, and provided different rules and different procedure for the railroads, because there is a different economic problem connected with them. If we attempted to put all industries under the pending measure, establishing different standards, we could not apply the law, because, after all, many of the other industries are not engaged in interstate commerce, and are not regulated by the Government as railroads are.

Mr. McCARRAN. Let me make this observation to the Senator, without having the facts behind me to support it: Today the truck lines are in nearly the same condition the railroads are insofar as bankruptcy is concerned. Does the Senator desire to set up another court for the truck lines of the country?

Mr. WHEELER. Not at all, because they are in an entirely different category. Anyone who knows anything about the bus and truck lines knows they are entirely separate from the railroads.

Mr. McCARRAN. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. Since 1887 the railroad problem has been recognized as a distinct and separate problem. We established the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1887 for the purpose of regulating the railroads. We recognized the railroad problem as distinct and separate. As the Senator from Kentucky has stated, the railroad problem stands out like a sore thumb, and needs separate and independent treatment, just as we gave the railroads separate treatment under section 77B

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, this is my last observation to the Senator today. My primary objection to the bill is because of the provision we are discussing, because it sets up a new and distinct system of courts, which would have nothing to do with a judicial system which has been recognized under the Constitution and under congressional acts for the

Mr. WHEELER. There is a distinct and separate set of laws with reference to railroads; consequently we have to have different provisions with reference to reorganizations of railroads than with respect to any other industry.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I give notice that as soon after the meeting of the Senate tomorrow as I can obtain recognition I shall address the Senate at some length on the pending amendment and certain other amendments which I propose to offer to the bill.

SENATE

SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1939

(Legislative day of Friday, May 19, 1939)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess

The Chaplain, Rev. Z@Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Come Holy Spirit, heavenly Dove, With all thy quickening powers; Kindle a flame of sacred love In these cold hearts of ours.

See how we grovel here below, Fond of these earthly toys; Our souls, how heavily they go, To reach eternal joys.

In vain we tune our lifeless songs, In vain we strive to rise; Hosannas languish on our tongues, And our devotion dies.

Come Holy Spirit, heavenly Dove, With all thy quickening powers; Come, shed abroad a Saviour's love, And that shall kindle ours.

Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. Barkley, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Friday, May 26, 1939, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

THE LOUISVILLE COURIER-JOURNAL

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, one of the greatest newspapers in the country is the Louisville Courier-Journal. It is remembered by many of the older people as the Journal of Henry Watterson, whose brilliant editorials gave it a national reputation. The passing of Watterson did not mean the passing of the Courier-Journal. Not only has its present publisher, Barry Bingham, and its editor, Mark Ethridge, maintained the great reputation of this paper but they have brought new recognition and luster to its name.

It is recognized as a household institution throughout the Middle West and the Ohio Valley, where it is widely read. It was gratifying, therefore, to the friends of this great paper to learn that recently its worth as a newspaper and the outstanding job it is doing in carrying on the best traditions of journalism were recognized by the University of Missouri School of Journalism in awarding to the Courier-Journal the school's citation this year for excellency in journalism.

On the occasion of the award of this citation the distinguished young publisher, Mr. Barry Bingham, responded in a brief address that is not only worthy of his great paper but of the profession of which he is so justly proud.

I ask unanimous consent that the citation and the brief address by Mr. Bingham may be incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the citation and address were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Citation]

THE COURIER-JOURNAL

To the Courier-Journal of Louisville, Ky.:

For 113 years of able journalism; for brilliantly colorful and epigrammatic editorial comment; for consistently meeting new conditions with successful adaptation; for contributing to the business growth and both the municipal and rural development of its area by discerning and articulate leadership; for independent and intelligent emphasis upon news coverage in its later years, and for recent progressive development of, and leadership in, graphic and pictorial journalism.

ADDRESS BY MR. BARRY BINGHAM

Ladies and gentlemen, it is a happy thing for me to be able to accept this citation from the School of Journalism of the University of Missouri. I am still new in the job of publishing a newspaper—in fact, I still have to refer to myself as a cub publisher—and this signal recognition of the Courier-Journal is the most inspiring thing that has happened to me since I fell heir to the publishing job in Louisville.

To have such an honer come to our paper from the State of

To have such an honor come to our paper from the State of Missouri is particularly pleasant. There are many connections between Missouri and Kentucky. A large number of Kentuckians pushed on out to this State in the pioneer days, and there are still manifold family connections between the people of the two States. A few years ago Kentucky undertook to hold a home-coming colories for each feet and their descendants and coming celebration for ex-Kentuckians and their descendants, and when the plans were announced a flood of inquiries came in from former Kentuckians and their descendants all over the country. It was significant that more inquiries came from Missouri than any other State, and the last names signed to nearly all the letters were the familiar family names that we meet in Kentucky every were the familiar rainly decay.

It is tremendously gratifying, too, to receive such recognition from a school of journalism which is really representing the highest ideals of the journalistic profession. I say that in all earnestness, and not in flattery. I think there is inclined to be too much flattery and too much mutual praise when newspaper people get together. Every man is likely to have a healthy respect for his trade and a strong sense of its importance, and that is certainly a good thing. Journalists, however, and particularly publishers, good thing. Journalists, however, and particularly publishers, usually go a good many steps beyond the pickle manufacturers and the organizations of master barbers and all the other trade groups in spreading the gospel of their own importance in the scheme of Whenever newspaper publishers meet in any numbers, we get Whenever newspaper publishers meet in any numbers, we get pronouncements concerning the high ideals of their craft, the need for keeping the flame of public service ever burning and the presses ever grinding, and particularly we hear the oft-repeated battle cry "freedom of the press." There has been a tendency on the part of American publishers to appropriate that part of the Bill of Rights which guarantees freedom of the press to themselves as their own precious possessions, and there is a corresponding fear on their part that somebody is going to try to take that possession away from them. session away from them.

If freedom of the press were really the exclusive possession of a small group of men who own newspapers, there is every likelihood that it would be taken away from them in short order. But the small group of the taken away from them in short order. But that it would be taken away from them in short order. But that truth is that freedom of the press is a possession of the American public at large and not of any small group. The far-sighted patriots who drew up the Bill of Rights had no idea of granting a partiots who drew up the Bill of Rights had no idea of granting a patriots who drew up the Bill of Rights had no idea of granting a special privilege to one class, to use as they saw fit. Their idea was to guarantee to the people at large that they would have the right to read publications that were not controlled and censored by any agency whatsoever, as the press of Germany and Italy and Russia is controlled and censored today.

Freedom of the press, then, was guaranteed in the spirit of equal rights to all and special privilege to none. Instead of giving the publishers of America an exclusive possession in press freedom, the authors of the Bill of Rights actually placed on the publishers a special responsibility, to provide the country with a free press. The right to a free press belongs to the people of America, not to the publishers of America. There are other methods besides Government censorship to produce a controlled, censored press, methods that some newspapers themselves have been willing to adopt. Americans who read distorted news stories, biased reports, and unfair presentation of daily happenings in their newspapers adopt. Americans who read distorted news stories, blased reports, and unfair presentation of daily happenings in their newspapers are being denied their constitutional right to a free press, for such a press cannot be free, regardless of where the control lies. Such papers are fortunately few, but their readers have a right to assail them for denying them a privilege guaranteed to them in the Constitution.

Nothing could be more injurious to American democracy, Heaven knows, than a press controlled by the Government. But the Government could control the press only if the people of the United States willed it, and they will never will such a thing unless they feel that the press has already sacrificed its freedom by its own dereliction of duty. In other words, if the American people should ever become convinced that their press was actually controlled by forces within itself, they would probably take the logical step and transfer control of the press to the Government. If they thought they were being denied their right to a free press by the special interests of the newspaper publishers themselves, it would be only natural for them to prefer a press controlled by the Government, which at least in theory represents the people at large and not a limited group.

The job for American newspapers to do, I believe, is not to fight off some shadowy foe on the outside who is believed to threaten off some shadowy foe on the outside who is believed to threaten press freedom. The fight is an internal one, and the foe is the type of publisher who is controlling his news columns for his own purposes. Such warping of the function of the press breaks down public confidence in newspapers at large. Public confidence is the bulwark on which the press must maintain its freedom. If the public ever loses entire confidence in newspapers, it will institute

Freedom of the press, as I have tried to express it, does not belong to the publishers of America as a group, but it is within their power to destroy that freedom for themselves and all the American people. Absolute honesty in the handling of news is the key to perpetual freedom for our press. If the publishers of America will devote themselves wholeheartedly to that ideal, I believe they will have nothing to fear now or at any time from outside enemies. The American public will defend us if we serve the public justiv the public justly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have just a word to add to what the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] has said about the great journal, the Louisville Courier-Journal.

Long before our day that newspaper became widely known throughout the Nation because of its brilliant and sound editorials and their highly literary quality. Before Henry Watterson became connected with the Courier-Journal, George D. Prentice was one of the most brilliant newspaper editors in America, and took his place along with Dana, James Gordon Bennett, and many others. Following him came Henry Watterson, who became a sort of institution. In those days the Courier-Journal was the household journal of nearly all the people of Kentucky and the immediately surrounding territory. In later years the newspaper was purchased by Judge Robert W. Bingham, who later became our Ambassador to England. Following his death, the Courier-Journal is now in charge of his son, Barry Bingham.

Not only from the standpoint of news, but from the standpoint of editorial policy, although most newspapers in this day have an editorial staff rather than a particular editor whose editorials are so distinctive as to be known when they are read, the Courier-Journal has maintained its high standards, its high quality, its impartial dissemination of the news, and has always stood for and now stands for the best things in American life politically, socially, economically, and in every other way.

Along with my friend from Indiana I am glad to congratulate the Courier-Journal upon the award to which he has called attention.

By Mr. BAILEY:

S. 2514. A bill to amend the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, to provide a comprehensive system for the training of merchant marine personnel, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce.

NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND THE RULE-AMENDMENT

Mr. MINTON. I submit in writing a notice of motion to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI, which I ask to have printed in the Record. At a later time I shall insist upon the motion. The notice referred to is as follows:

In accordance with rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that it is my intention to move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 6260) making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, for civil functions administered by the War Department, and for other purposes, the following amendment, namely: On page 9, at the end of line 13, after the word "law", to add a colon and the following: "Provided further, That in the case of any local flood-protection work in the Ohlo River Basin authorized to be prosecuted by the provisions of section 4 of the act entitled 'An act authorizing the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, and for other purposes, approved June 28, 1938, the President is authorized to waive the requirements of section 3 of the Flood Control Act, approved June 22, 1936, with respect to local cooperation to the extent of not to exceed 50 percent of the estimated cost of the lands, easements, and rights-of-way required for such work, if he finds, after investigation, that the city or town to be benefited by such work is, by reason of its financial condition, unable to comply with the requirements of such section 3 with respect to local cooperation."

Mr. MINTON also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 6260, making appropriations for civil functions administered by the War Department, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

(See the foregoing notice for text of amendment referred to.)

FINANCIAL REHABILITATION OF RAILROADS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1869) to protect interstate commerce from the dangers of unsound financial structures and to establish improved procedures and standards for financial rehabilitation of railroads engaged in interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the Senate took a recess yesterday the pending amendment was, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "court of the United States" and insert the word "tribunal."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, this amendment was offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Clark], who does not appear to be present at the moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri gave notice yesterday, according to the Record, that he desired to discuss the pending question, but the Chair does not see the Senator from Missouri on the floor at the moment.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass] is detained from the Senate because of illness. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is absent because of illness in his family.

The Senator from New York [Mr. Meap] is absent attending the funeral of the late Representative Lord, of New York.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. Bankhead], the Senator from Washington [Mr. Bone], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Brown], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Byrd], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Byrnes], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Gillette], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Hill], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Russell], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Slattery], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Tydings] are absent on important public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment stated by the Chair a moment ago, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "court of the United States" and insert in lieu thereof "tribunal."

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only a moment with reference to this motion. It is not made for the purpose of delaying action on the pending bill. It is made, however, for two reasons. The first reason is that a standing committee of this body, if it has any function whatever or any place in the life of this body, should be recognized.

This bill creates in this country a new judicial system that has its jurisdiction limited to one particular class of business. If there is within the Senate any committee that should know the jurisdiction of courts and is indeed created for the purpose of investigating judicial matters, it is the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Committee on the Judiciary is responsible for every bill that comes from the Department of Justice and with which the Department of Justice has to do. The Committee on the Judiciary is constituted of those who sought place on that committee because they made its work their life study. To say that from the Committee on Commerce or the Committee on Interstate Commerce or the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry should come a bill which prescribes the jurisdiction of courts and creates an entirely new judicial system without having it first scrutinized by the committee which was set up for the purpose of scrutinizing that particular class of legislation, is, first of all, an insult to those who constitute the membership of the Committee on the Judiciary, and, secondly, is disregarding the precedents of this body.

In other words, if courts are to be created on the recommendation of various committees within this body without any consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary, and if new jurisdictions are to be set up in those courts, then we may have courts coming out of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; we may have courts coming out of the Committee on Commerce; we may have courts, as in this instance, coming out of the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. For the Senator's information, I may say that only recently we passed a criminal statute which came from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. McCARRAN. May I ask if that measure was submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary before it reached the floor of the Senate?

Mr. HATCH. Oh, no.

Mr. McCARRAN. Then the Senator's suggestion simply emphasizes my argument. I dare say that scarcely a handful of Senators today can tell me what that statute was. So I say that this bill should go to the Judiciary Committee for review and examination.

Mr. President, I will amend my motion. Lest, perchance, someone may think I seek to defer action on the bill, I ask to amend my motion so as to provide that the Committee on the Judiciary shall report within 15 days.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report it back within 15 days.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it was not my intention to take any of the time of the Senate on this bill; but several Senators and some persons not Senators have asked me about it; therefore, a few words might be appropriate.

I invite the attention of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] to the provision on page 2, beginning with line 6 and ending with the word "circuit", on line 11, providing for roving or ambulatory judges. Am I correctly advised that that provision has been deleted from the bill?

Mr. HATCH. The Senator is quite right. That provision was stricken from the bill by an amendment suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Colorado did good

Mr. HATCH. The provision is out of the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. It is out of the bill.

As to the general principle of the bill, that is to say, whether or not there should be a special court to deal with matters regarding bankruptcies, receiverships, and trusteeships on railroads, I express no opinion. There is only one thing to be learned from history, and that is that nations and governments do not learn from history. Many years ago Congress created the Commerce Court. It existed 2 or 3 years and then both the great political parties urged its abolition. It was held by the lawyers of that day that we could not constitutionally abolish the offices of the judges. They were therefore sent out to work upon the various circuits as roving or ambulatory judges. Realizing that governments seldom, if ever, learn anything from history, I am not holding up that special court as an illustration, as a warning, or as a precedent.

As to the motion of my learned friend from Nevada [Mr. McCarranl, who is a valued member of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, I should congratulate him upon the jealous regard, the scrupulous care he takes respecting the functions, duties, and jurisdiction of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. However, what the Senate Committee on the Judiciary says or decides is by no means ex cathedra. There are in this body many good lawyers who are not members of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. We wish they were; but I think I ought also to say that some of the most distinguished lawyers of the United States are members of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

The Committee on the Judiciary is a servant of and creature of the Senate. The Senate has the power to send a bill to any committee the Senate may choose.

The Senate Committee on the Judiciary is constantly considering questions of adjective law, substantive law, jurisdiction of courts, and constitutional law, and it may be that at times we do not proceed with the haste which characterizes governments nowadays. I take pride rather in the fact that in the Committee on the Judiciary we do deliberate. We hesitate, and explore, and no one seems to suffer as a result. Whenever a man in parliamentary matters or in most departments of life says "This must be done at once," he puts the wrong brand upon his own remedy. He discounts in advance the value of his proposition. Whenever in parliamentary government we are told that something must be done at once we are in effect told that the matter may not stand the scrutiny of argument.

On the whole, I do not feel offended; I am not hurt, because the bill did not go to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. Had it gone to that committee, we would have given it our careful attention, possibly not closer attention than it received before the Interstate Commerce Committee; possibly we would not have shed more light upon it than has been shed upon it by the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I cannot forget that the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce is presided over by a Senator whom I conceive to be a very great lawyer. When we were in the university together more years ago than I care to remember, I predicted that he would become a great lawyer; and he has.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President-

Mr. ASHURST. Let me conclude this remark. Moreover I am not thin skinned, in fact, I am pachydermatous, that is, thick skinned; so personally I am not hurt. I do not believe that any slight or disdain was intended toward the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. Had such slight been offered, I should, in a most polite way, have resented it.

I now yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. In connection with the Senator's school days, I was thinking of asking him whether he admitted publicly that he was as old as the Senator from Montana.

Mr. ASHURST. The sands of life have run longer and have trickled faster through the glass for me than they have

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I assure the Senator from Arizona that no slight was intended to the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill seeks to amend the interstate commerce law and the so-called Railroad Bankruptcy Act, both of which came from the Committee on Interstate Commerce. We did add the provision relating to the setting up of a court. As I stated at the outset, that was not my suggestion; it did not emanate from me.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will not the Senator speak louder so that we may all hear?

Mr. WHEELER. I repeat, no slight was intended to the Committee on the Judiciary. As a matter of fact, there are members of the Committee on the Judiciary who serve most ably upon the Committee on Interstate Commerce. The pending bill has been pending since March 21, and no one ever questioned the reference of the bill. It is only since the bill has come onto the floor of the Senate that the matter has been mentioned.

I call attention to the fact that of the many bills which seek to regulate interstate commerce, some have gone to the Committee on Commerce, and some to other committees. A measure recently considered, in which the Senator from Nevada was interested, for the regulation of aircraft, was first pending before the Committee on Interstate Commerce. The waterway bill was pending before the Interstate Commerce Committee, because it provided for the regulation of interstate commerce.

It has been the practice of the Senate, as has been well said, that bills affecting interstate commerce go before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, unless some particular objection is raised, and certainly none was ever raised by the Senator from Arizona in this case. If objection had been raised, the Senator from Arizona knows that I certainly would not have intended any slight toward him. But the pending bill was gone over and very carefully examined by the members of the Committee on the Judiciary who happened to be members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. ASHURST. I probably should conclude here, but allow me further to say-and I am speaking now to the country more than to the Senate, if indeed anyone in the country should deign to read what I say-the procedure as to the introduction of a bill in the Senate is not always understood by those who are not Senators. A Senator introducing a bill has the privilege—and I do not quarrel with it, it is a privilege he should have-after he has drafted a bill to consider to what committee he will send his bill. It may be believed by some that when bills are introduced the Vice President scans each bill and determines to which committee it shall go. The Vice President cannot do that. If he did that, he would never do anything else. So the Senate by practice has given the privilege to each Senator to name the committee to which a bill introduced by him shall go, and I doubt whether I have ever introduced a bill during my service here wherein I failed to indicate to what committee I desired to have the bill referred. That is not a bad practice, particularly in view of the fact that the Senate has the power at any time to withdraw a bill from one committee and send it to another.

I conclude by saying that I am doubtful about special courts, but in the circumstance, in view of the present posture of affairs and the tremendous complexities of the railroad problems, I shall waive whatever doubts I may have and vote for the bill. I would not have voted for the bill had it not been for the adoption of the amendment offered by the able Senator from Colorado which strikes out the provision which made the judges roving, or ambulatory. While ordinarily I should like to join and be associated with my able friend from Nevada, I shall feel constrained to vote against his motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCarran] that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report within 15 days.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I realize that there is not a quorum of the Senate present today, except a synthetic quorum. I also realize that a demand for a roll call would force the pending bill to go over until next Monday. Investigation has led me to believe that the result on next Monday would be the same as the result of a vote without a quorum and without a roll call will be today. Therefore, rather than embarrass the Members of the Senate who do not happen to be present, I do not desire unduly to delay the Senate and will not ask for a roll call on my amendment. I do desire to discuss it, however, very briefly.

In connection with the amendment offered yesterday, I am just advised by the Senator from Montana that in my absence the amendment was disposed of. So I present the next amendment I desire to have adopted, on line 3, page 2, after the word "Senate", to insert the words "who shall have been formally admitted to the practice of the law."

Mr. WHEELER. I have no objection to that amendment. Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I offer the amendment by reason of the fact that some of the news columnists in this city have already intimated that it is the purpose to constitute this court of men who are not lawyers, and it seems to me the court should consist of lawyers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. There is a question upon which I seek enlightenment, and I address my question to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Are the judges of the proposed court to be judges of general jurisdiction, or are they to be special judges whose jurisdiction shall be limited to the matters within the four corners of the pending bill?

Mr. WHEELER. They are really to be judges of general jurisdiction, because they are to be United States judges, constitutional judges. I assumed, of course, that in appointing the judges the President would appoint lawyers. I would not want to see it otherwise, and now that the amendment has been agreed to, there cannot be any doubt about it.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator says they will be judges of general jurisdiction. My view of the Constitution is that Congress has the power to prescribe the jurisdiction of an inferior court.

Mr. WHEELER. We have limited the jurisdiction of the court, and these judges are to be appointed to the court.

Mr. ASHURST. That is what I mean. Mr. WHEELER. I perhaps misunderstood the Senator, then. The jurisdiction of the court, of course, is limited.

Mr. ASHURST. The court, then, is not to have general jurisdiction.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct. Mr. ASHURST. The only cases cognizable upon appeal or otherwise would be those which came squarely and simply and solely and only within the four corners of the pending bill, or such amendatory act as might be passed thereafter. Am I correct?

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator's statement is accurate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will not the Senator from Montana agree that when we have once created the proposed court, and the judges thereof have once been appointed and confirmed, they then will be circuit judges of the United States?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And if such situations should arise as arose in the case of the Commerce Court, and the Congress should seek to abolish the new court, Congress would still have to find employment for the judges of the new court as circuit court judges?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In other words, Congress will be creating either a special court or providing for the appointment of a number of supernumeraries as Federal circuit judges.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Two or three of the ablest lawyers in this body have indicated to me their opinion that Congress has the power subsequently to abolish the judgeships in question. With due deference to the opinion of those Senators, I will say that I do not agree with them in that respect. When the proposed judges are appointed, confirmed, and commissioned they are appointed for life.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I take it that the Senator from Arizona is of the opinion that by abolishing the court we could not abolish the court officers?

Mr. ASHURST. We could abolish the court, but the judges would remain. They would receive their salaries. They might have no duties to perform, they would have no jurisdiction, but they could be distributed among the districts or circuits of the United States as the Congress chose.

My opinion is that when these judges are commissioned they are there for life unless and until impeached.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. King in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Indiana for the purpose of asking a question of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. MINTON. Did not Jefferson abolish the court which Congress created, composed of the "midnight judges"?

Mr. ASHURST. There is a long history in connection with that matter.

Mr. MINTON. That is true, is it not?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. MINTON. And did not that action on the part of Jefferson dispose of the judges as well as the Court?

Mr. ASHURST. That might have been done.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The validity of the original act was questioned.

Mr. MINTON. No; the law was repealed. That was all that was done.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri further yield until I shall have completed my statement?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. At the hour of midnight, or 1 minute before midnight, of March 3, 1801, James Madison, who was soon to become Secretary of State, walked into the room where the President was engaged in signing commissions, and said, "You are no longer authorized to sign commissions. You will no longer be President within one minute." Considerable discussion arose as to whether the commissions issued would be valid.

I ask the Senator from Missouri whether that is not his recollection of what occurred.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. My understanding of the circumstances which the Senator has just related is that the incoming Secretary of State or Secretary of State designate, James Madison, walked into the office of the outgoing Secretary—

Mr. ASHURST. That is correct-John Marshall.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He walked into the office of the outgoing Secretary of State, John Marshall, and laid his watch on the desk and said, "This is the President's watch. Any commissions issued after this time will be illegal."

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. ASHURST. I will yield in just a moment.

I would not have entered the discussion had not the present phase of the question been brought up. There will be other Congresses which—mirabile dictu!—wonderful to relate—will be as able as is the present Congress, and they can settle that question when they reach it. Not that I wish to throw upon succeeding Senators or Representatives the problem of solving any question. Our decision as to whether such judges would be permanent or not will not bind any succeeding Senate.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I think the Supreme Court of the United States 15 years after the date to which the learned chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has referred, rendered an opinion which in substance answers his question. That was in the case of Martin v. Hunter (1 Wheat. 304), in which appears the following:

Congress is bound to create some inferior courts in which to vest all that jurisdiction which, under the Constitution, is exclusively vested in the United States, and of which the Supreme Court cannot take original cognizance. It might establish one or more inferior courts, and might parcel out the jurisdiction among such courts from time to time at their own pleasure. But the whole judicial power of the United States should be at all times vested either in an original or appellate form in some courts created under its authority.

I submit that that language answers the question.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator from Vermont for reading that opinion. Possibly I was misunderstood. I do not question that the judicial power is with courts. I only say that, in my judgment, Congress could not remove those judges except by impeachment. Congress has the power to limit or define the jurisdiction, or deprive them of jurisdiction. Is that the purport of the decision?

Mr. AUSTIN. I believe that is not the whole purport of the decision. My interpretation of what I have read is that from time to time courts which are inferior to the Supreme Court of the United States may be abolished by Congress, but that at all times there must be a repository for all the judicial power; and if Congress destroys or discontinues one of these courts, the judicial power of the United States must be vested somewhere else. That is all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, if I felt there were any possibility of my views prevailing on this question, I would be glad to force the matter over for consideration until next Monday by demanding a roll call. From investigation I have made I have become convinced that the result on Monday would be the same as the result will undoubtedly be today. Therefore, I am not disposed to ask that the matter go over.

I merely desire to express my opposition to the proposed legislation, and to such type of legislation, and I will do so as briefly as may be in order not to detain the Senate unduly on Saturday afternoon.

Mr. President, if my original motion had prevailed to divest the body which it is proposed to set up of the character of a Federal court by striking out the words "a court of the United States is hereby created" and inserting the words "a tribunal is hereby created", it would then have been important perhaps to offer an amendment to conform to the suggestions made on yesterday by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borah] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] to limit the tenure of the judges of the proposed court to a period of 9 years, or 8 years, or 7 years. That is a matter with respect to which I have no great pride of opinion, but certainly their tenure should be limited to a definite period of years.

I admit that under the Constitution of the United States it is not possible for us legally to adopt the amendment striking out the words on page 2, line 5, that these judges "shall hold office during good behavior", and insert a provision for a tenure of a definite period of years, which I should like to do. If my original amendment had been adopted it would then have been my purpose to insist upon going through the bill and striking out everything in it having to do with this body in the character of a court. I shall not pursue that procedure, because the action of the Senate in rejecting my original amendment proposing to change the proposed body from a court to a tribunal, or a board, or a commission, or what Senators may please to call it, is indicative of the temper of the Senate, and, without that amendment, it is impossible to pursue the course, by the submission of further amendments, which I desired to pursue.

However, I wish to say, Mr. President, that in passing this measure, in my judgment, we are creating one of the most dangerous precedents which has ever been created in the judicial history of the United States. For the first time in our history we are setting up a court, a Federal court, a circuit court of the United States, for the consideration of the interests of one special industry in the United States. That was not true even in the case of the Commerce Court, because even the ill-omened and ill-famed and ultimately disgraced Commerce Court was not set up for one special industry.

Mr. President, if we have to set up a special court for the railroads, there is no reason why we should not set up another special court for the truck interests; there is no reason why we should not set up another special court for the gas utilities; there is no reason why we should not set up another special court for the electric utilities, the power companies. In the past few years we have heard many times in this body that the bituminous-coal industry is a sick industry. We shall be called upon to set up a special court for the bituminous-coal industry. If we set up a special court for one special industry, there is no reason for not setting up other special Federal courts for other special industries.

Mr. President, the reason assigned for the creation of a special court in the case of railroads is that, according to general conception-with which I agree-there has been some mismanagement of railroad receiverships by certain Federal courts. There has been the same sort of mismanagement by certain Federal courts as to utility receiverships; there has been the same sort of mismanagement by certain Federal courts as to private corporation receiverships, and it seems to me the remedy for that condition does not go to the question of railroad receiverships. It goes to the question of all receiverships. The remedy for that condition is not to set up a special court to deal with railroad receiverships. It is to go to the bottom of the misconduct, if such there be, of certain Federal judges, and either to impeach them or to set up a different system having to do with receiverships in all courts, whether they be railroad receiverships or any other kind of receiverships. So far as the railroads are concerned, in contradistinction to other corporations which may be in receivership, the railroads are in a peculiarly fortunate position, because under the present law trustees appointed by Federal courts in railroad receiverships must be approved by the Interstate Commerce Com-

Mr. President, I am opposed to the bill. I would rather have a commission than a court, because it is easier to abolish a commission than to abolish a court. However, I am fundamentally opposed to creating new commissions, and I am particularly opposed to creating new courts of special jurisdiction.

I realize that it is impossible successfully to oppose the combination which may be evidenced by the vote on this question in this body. We have the railroad executives, the railroad brotherhoods, the ardent new dealers, and the reactionary Republicans in a hard-and-fast line for the passage of the bill. One of the first things I remember being told by my father when I was a little boy was never to think that I could butt my head through a stone wall. I realize exactly the effect of any remarks that I or other Senators may make on the floor of the Senate in the face of the combination to which I have referred. Nevertheless, I wish to make my views a matter of record. I predict, Mr. President-and I shall come back later to remark on the effect of my prediction-that the creation of a special class court for one particular industry will have as disastrous and ultimately as disgraceful effects as did the creation of the Commerce Court of ill-omened memory.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Adams] a question with respect to his amendment which was agreed to yesterday. As I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, it undertook to eliminate what are called roving judges.

Mr. ADAMS. The purpose of the amendment was to take away the power which the bill gave to the Chief Justice to assign Railroad Reorganization Court justices to sit as either district or circuit judges in cases of general jurisdiction.

Mr. BORAH. If the judges are to be appointed with limited jurisdiction and limited powers, as it is now contended they will be, how could they be assigned to general service as Federal judges?

Mr. ADAMS. Only by virtue of the statutory authorization which was in the bill before the amendment. The bill authorized such procedure, and I suppose by virtue of the control Congress has any judge could be assigned if that were the express will of Congress.

Mr. BORAH. I am asking the question for the purpose of ascertaining the opinion of those in charge of the bill, and the opinion of the able Senator from Colorado as to the definition of the jurisdiction of the court. It seems to me it is exceedingly important that this legislative body define what it understands to be the jurisdiction of the proposed court.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator, on page 7, section 4 (a), the language is:

The Railroad Reorganization Court, acting by a quorum or by a single judge as herein provided, shall have all the jurisdiction posessed by the district courts of the United States and of the judges thereof, (1) under and with respect to section 77 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory and supplementary thereto (hereinafter referred to as the Bankruptcy Act), and (2) in and with respect to equity re-ceiverships of railroad corporations (as defined in the aforesaid section 77).

I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Congress recognized that there was a distinct and separate problem with reference to railroads. When we passed section 77 it was not a general bankruptcy act for utilities, trucks, and bus interests. It was a specific and definite act with reference to bankruptcy of railroads. So the Congress recognized the railroad problem as a separate and distinct problem, as contrasted with receiverships with respect to busses, trucks, and all the other things that have been mentioned.

When we set up the Interstate Commerce Commission we recognized the railroad problem as a separate and distinct problem. Today, as never before in the history of the country, everybody recognizes the importance of the railroad problem. The proposed court is spoken of as being a railroad court. It is not a railroad court. It is a bankruptcy court, whose duty it is to handle receiverships and bankruptcies. What we are seeking to do in the bill is to take away from the railroad courts jurisdiction over railroad bankruptcies and receiverships. Those who opposed the bill before the committee wanted to have such matters remain in the railroad courts. We are seeking to take them away from the railroad courts and set up a court in which railroad receiverships and bankruptcies cannot be manipulated.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has been in the Senate long enough to know that he must make up his own mind as to who wants what. He cannot be certain about it from reports which come from those who have an interest on one side or the other.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, the new court is to have limited jurisdiction.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. And a litigant could not go into the court with anything in the nature of general litigation.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. Then, I take it that a judge appointed to that court of limited jurisdiction would have no power to serve in any other court.

Mr. WHEELER. I think that is correct. Certainly that is the situation in the present form of the bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Are the judges to be appointed for

Mr. WHEELER. Under the Constitution they must be appointed for life.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is it the assumption that the railroads are to be permanently in bankruptcy?

Mr. WHEELER. I stated on the floor yesterday that I should have been perfectly willing to limit the tenure of office of the judges; but under the Constitution I came to the conclusion that it could not be done.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. King in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. The statement of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borah] that the powers of the judges under the bill are limited to the special jurisdiction conferred is now true: but it is true only because of the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Adams], which has been agreed

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. HATCH. Unless that amendment had been agreed to, the judges would have had all the power of both district and circuit judges.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. To what language does the Senator from

New Mexico refer?

Mr. HATCH. The language on page 2, line 8, which says that the judges may "be designated and assigned by the Chief Justice of the United States for temporary service in the district court for any district or the circuit court of appeals for any circuit." That language has been eliminated. It is not now in the bill.

Mr. BORAH. That language was stricken out.

Mr. HATCH. Yes. Mr. BORAH. But suppose it had not been stricken out. If the judges were appointed to a court of limited jurisdiction, with no power except to do specific and particular things, how could they be assigned to perform duties which they had never been authorized to perform?

Mr. HATCH. That language has now been stricken out and is no longer in the bill. It was the view of some of us that it was dangerous.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I said a moment ago that I did not desire to detain the Senate by an unduly long discussion of this matter, but one statement just made by my friend from Montana I cannot permit to go unchallenged. He stated that the purpose of this bill is to transfer jurisdiction of receiverships from railroad courts and that those who are opposed to the bill are in favor of retaining jurisdiction in railroad courts.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I explained that, and said that I referred to those who came before the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand the Senator explained that he was not reflecting on any Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. No; I was not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There are many people in the United States who are opposed to setting up special courts who do not regard the courts of the United States as railroad courts. I can say that in my State, where there are four or five-I think five-trunk lines in receivership, there are five district judges and one circuit judge, the son of the late Senator Stone, of Missouri, one of the most eminent jurists in the United States. So far as the five district judges are concerned, two of them are Democrats, appointed by the present President of the United States and confirmed by this body. The other three are Republicans, appointed by former Presidents of the United States and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. President, I do not believe there is one citizen in the State of Missouri who believes that the court of any of those judges, either Democrat or Republican, is a railroad court. I do not believe that there are very many people in the State of Missouri who would not have more confidence in the administration of a great trust by any one of those five judges, Democrat or Republican, whether appointed by President Roosevelt or one of his predecessors, than he would in a court set up here in Washington, far away from the scene of their trust, operating through Janizaries that might be sent out from this city.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, just a word following what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has said. I have given considerable thought to that phase of the matter, and I have been driven to vote against the bill because of one thing. The bill provides for the appointment of a new court, which cannot understand all the problems, to hold its sessions in the city of Washington and to take jurisdiction of every receivership, every bankruptcy throughout the railroad systems of the United States, all the attorneyships and everything else connected with them.

One of the railroads in my State is in the Federal court under the jurisdiction of a judge in whom all the people have confidence, who is familiar with the problems, which are difficult and intricate. Our interest and our concern is to maintain the railroad system in operation, to make the necessary concessions and work out the necessary reorganization. I am apprehensive of the creation of a court of five men concentrated in Washington, none of them, probably, coming from the western section of the country, for it seems that the section west of the Mississippi River is no longer deemed able to furnish men for the high courts. It is no longer represented on the Supreme Court of the United States. Although for many years two Justices on that Court came from the West, now appointments are made from other sections. I feel driven to vote against the bill by reason of the tremendous concentration of power which the bill

There have been abuses in the courts—naturally we know they are not general but rather sporadic-but by this bill we are proposing to concentrate power in the hands of five men who are to be appointed and who are to sit in Washington. If there were any assurance of protection on the part of these five men, of course, it would be the thing to do, butvield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the Senator have any real doubt that any five men selected by Mr. Thomas G. Corcoran and Ben Cohen would have all wisdom?

Mr. ADAMS. I decline to comment on that suggestion.

Mr. HATCH. I am not convinced that Mr. Corcoran is going to make any appointments. But the point I rose to make was this: The Senator from Montana talks about the wisdom of five judges; the Senator from Missouri talks about the wisdom of five judges. Why do they say "five judges"? Why do they not say one judge, for, under the terms of the bill, is it not true that one judge may exercise all the duties and powers of the court?

Mr. WHEELER. No.

Mr. HATCH. Why not?

Mr. WHEELER. Because it is not so provided in the bill.

Mr. HATCH. I think it is so provided in the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. One judge may be assigned to the consideration of incidental matters, but the same provisions are written into this bill as are contained in the law with reference to the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. HATCH. I say frankly to the Senator from Montana that I am not so familiar with this bill as I should like to be, and that is the reason I am asking the questions.

Mr. WHEELER. I understand. I repeat, we have incorporated into the pending bill the provisions now in the law with reference to the circuit court of appeals concerning action by a majority of the judges. The bill provides that in certain detailed matters one judge may act in certain instances for the purpose of expediting matters.

Mr. HATCH. I do not wish to delay, but would the Senator explain for my benefit what are those "detailed matters" upon which one judge may act in place of the court?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, while the Senator from Montana is looking up the provision in the bill, may I make a statement as to my understanding? There are certain detailed matters which may be assigned to one judge, but a quorum of the court consisting of three members may sit, and a majority of those three members may exercise all the powers of the court. So, instead of being a one-judge court, it may be a two-judge court.

Mr. WHEELER. The same provision is in the existing law with reference to the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. ADAMS. But I have made a correct statement, have I not?

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is correct. The pending bill makes the identical provision in this regard as is made by the present law for the circuit court of appeals. For instance, in the ninth circuit—I do not know how many judges there may be in the eighth circuit, but in the ninth circuit there are seven judges, and they are behind in their work. So, for the purpose of expediting the work frequently only three judges sit, and the three other judges, for instance, go to Portland or Los Angeles or some other place. So, a majority of the three judges, which is two, decide cases.

Mr. HATCH. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the particular language which aroused my curiosity. It is found on page 7, section 4.

JURISDICTION

Sec. 4. (a) The Railroad Reorganization Court, acting by a quorum or by a single judge as herein provided—

That is, the entire court or a quorum of the court or a single judge of a court—shall have all the jurisdiction possessed by the district courts of the United States and of the judges thereof—

That gives to one judge "all the jurisdiction possessed by the district courts of the United States and the judges thereof"—

(1) under and with respect to section 77 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory and supplementary thereto.

Does not that give to one judge the power to act?

Mr. WHEELER. Coming back to page 3, it is there provided:

Provided further, That the court, with a quorum participating, may in its discretion, on application of any interested person, or of its own motion, grant a rehearing or reconsideration by it of the determination of a single judge if sufficient reason therefor be made to appear, but the court may by general rules confine the opportunity to make applications for rehearing or reconsideration to matters or determinations of certain classes or description which in its opinion present issues requiring consideration by a quorum.

It was desired to so frame the bill as to expedite the consideration of comparatively small matters which may come before the court by allowing one judge to act in certain instances, but then the bill provides that in the event the one judge should decide a question upon request a quorum of the court shall be required to review it.

Mr. HATCH. I merely wish to say to the Senator from Montana that I wanted to vote for the bill. I am not like the Senator from Missouri, who wants to set up a board or a commission or some agency to transact judicial powers. I think judicial powers should be vested in a court. I am trying to understand something about the bill, and I cannot help but believe that the language used in the section beginning on page 7, which is the section which defines jurisdiction, confers jurisdiction not alone upon the court, not alone upon a quorum of the court, but it also confers the same jurisdiction upon a single judge of the court. I make that statement somewhat along the line of an interrogation. I desire information on the subject; that is all.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that when we provide that a court may act through judges we have got to confer jurisdiction upon the judges. So the bill confers jurisdiction upon the judges, but by other provisions the actions of the court in deciding matters are limited to a quorum the same as in the circuit court of appeals. What is bothering the Senator is that it confers jurisdiction, as I understand him, upon judges.

Mr. HATCH. Oh, no! I have no objection to conferring jurisdiction upon the court as a whole, or even upon a quorum of the court, if necessary; but I think we are conferring upon a single judge all the jurisdiction which we give to the court as a whole.

Mr. WHEELER. What the Senator disregards is this language:

The Railroad Reorganization Court, acting by a quorum or by a single judge as herein provided—

Then, as I say, we go back to the other provisions to which I called the Senator's attention, which absolutely protect the litigant except in minor details, as to which one judge may act.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, in connection with this discussion, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana what is meant by the language appearing on page 3, line 11:

The chief judge may assign any matter in a proceeding to a single judge for final determination.

In what matters could not a single judge himself make the final decision?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know that I quite catch the Senator's suggestion. The language is:

The chief judge may assign any matter in a proceeding to a single judge for final determination.

Mr. ELLENDER. What matters? To what extent could the single judge adjudicate on "matters" to finality? The language is rather broad and should be more specific.

Mr. WHEELER. I think we should have to say the bill means that instead of assigning a matter to a master in chancery for the purpose of taking evidence, the chief justice may say to a single judge, "You may take the evidence in this particular matter and the recommendations will come back to the court."

Mr. ELLENDER. Why add the words "for final determination"? Why empower a single judge to pass final judgment if his duties are to be in the nature of a master in chancery for the purpose of taking evidence?

Mr. WHEELER. Then the proviso follows:

Provided, That a quorum shall be requisite on the question of determination of a fair upset price and on the question of final confirmation (1) of a plan or (2) of sale of property of the debtor or of the railroad corporation in receivership at not less than a fair upset price: Provided further, That the court, with a quorum participating, may in its discretion, on application of any interested person, or of its own motion, grant a rehearing or reconsideration by it of the determination of a single judge if sufficient reason therefor be made to appear.

Mr. ELLENDER. Even with that proviso, why leave in the language on line 13, "for final determination"? I believe the language should be stricken from the bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, a railroad reorganization involves transactions extending clear across the continent, perhaps; and numerous orders from time to time, perhaps daily, have to be made in the operation of such a railroad in receivership or under trusteeship—incidental, interlocutory orders; orders that must go into effect immediately, because they relate to operation of the road day after day-and they should be in the possession and jurisdiction of one judge. Receivers or trustees should not be required to come to Washington and get a final determination of those questions before a court of three members. If that were done, we should never in the world get through. No receivership would be practical, no trusteeship would be practical, if we should strike out the word "determination," and should not have reposing somewhere near headquarters, near where the railroad was operated, somebody who could make a final determination of such matters as I have described.

Mr. ELLENDER. Could not more specific language be found than "any matter," so as to make it certain that a single judge will be clothed only with such duties as were outlined by the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. AUSTIN. I should not be so intemperate as to try to prescribe all the conceivable proceedings which would have to be included in the bill in order to make this provision work.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I reiterate my inquiry. In the light of the language to which the Senator from Vermont has been addressing his remarks, about one judge making a final determination, and in the light of the language which I read a moment ago on page 7, apparently conferring upon a single judge the same jurisdiction that is conferred upon the whole court, what is the Senator's interpretation? How much power does a single judge have, how much power does the court have, and how much power does a quorum have?

I merely want to get the views of the Senator.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, we shall have to separate that question. Jurisdiction and power have both been mixed up in the question, and they do not mean the same thing.

Mr. HATCH. Let us first take up the question of juris-

Mr. AUSTIN. Very well.

It is intended by the bill—and I think the bill accomplishes it-to give jurisdiction over all the things that may conceivably have to be administered as property of a railroad company, both the things that are used in operating the plant and things that are not used in operating the plant, but represent investments, nonoperating property. All the jurisdiction that the Constitution says Congress shall exercise through bankruptcy is intended to be invested in this court-all of it-and it is taken away from all other courts. But that means we have conformed to what we understand to be the law of the land, as interpreted in the Hunter case, to which I referred a few moments ago-that if we take away from the district courts of the United States a part of their jurisdiction, we must find another repository for it, because all of the jurisdiction which must be exercised by a court must be provided by Congress, and that is all expected to be transmitted to this court by this bill.

If our language is too restrictive to accomplish that purpose, it is faulty. I, however, interpret the limitations as not too restrictive. These limitations are to the provisions of section 77. Hereafter section 77 will be as we are writing it.

The second thing is sufficient jurisdiction to comprehend all cases of equity receivership that are comprehended by section 77. That does not mean all equity receiverships.

Mr. HATCH. Equity receiverships of railroad corporations?

Mr. AUSTIN. That is it-of railroad corporations.

When it comes to power, I think we have another matter. Mr. HATCH. What has the Senator to say about the jurisdiction of the whole court or the jurisdiction of an individual judge?

Mr. AUSTIN. That certainly is confusing. The purpose of that language is to accommodate the bill to the differing conditions which arise in railroad reorganizations.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I am asking these questions of the Senator in all good faith. He knows the respect and confidence I have in his judgment. Does the Senator from Vermont think it is a good idea, in a bill of this type and character, to confer jurisdiction on a single judge? Is that a good idea?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. And the Senator thinks the bill does that?

Mr. AUSTIN. I think it does.

Mr. HATCH. That is what I want to be sure about.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; I have that persuasion. Mr. HATCH. Then, I was correct in my interpretation; so the single judge does have all the power conferred on the court as a whole by this section.

Mr. AUSTIN. No; not at all. He has jurisdiction, but his power is limited.

Mr. HATCH. How is it limited?

Mr. AUSTIN. It is limited by this proviso:

That a quorum shall be requisite on the question of determination of a fair upset price—

That takes two judges instead of one and on the question of final confirmation-

That takes two judges-

(1) of a plan or (2) sale of property of the debtor-

That is, any property-or of the railroad corporation in receivership at not less than a fair upset price:

There is another limitation:

Provided further, That the court, with a quorum participating, may in its discretion, on application of any interested person, or of its own motion, grant a rehearing or reconsideration by it of the determination of a single judge if sufficient reason therefor be made to appear, but the court may by general rules confine the opportunity to make applications for rehearing or reconsideration to matters or determinations of certain classes or description which it is opinion present issues requiring consideration by which in its opinion present issues requiring consideration by a quorum.

I am not certain that I have called attention to all the limitations. I believe, however, that that is the general limitation upon the power of the single judge.

Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. WHEELER addressed the Chair. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield first to the Senator from Kentucky. Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, reading all these provisions together-first, that-

Three judges shall constitute a quorum, except as otherwise herein provided, and a determination concurred in by a majority of the judges participating shall constitute the determination of the court-

I imagine that the sentence-

The chief judge may assign any matter in a proceeding to a single judge refers to a proceeding, of course, which has already been instituted and is pending before the court. Instead of having, as the Senator says, all litigants come to Washington, it might be necessary to send a single judge to Minnesota or Arizona or California or Maine to hold hearings with respect to some question in a proceeding.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question at that point?

Mr. BARKLEY. In a second; and in the determination of the matters for which he was sent out as a single judge his decision would be final, subject, however, to these provisions:

Provided, That a quorum shall be requisite on the question of determination of a fair upset price and on the question of final confirmation (1) of a plan or (2) of sale of property of the debtor or of the railroad corporation in receivership at not less than a fair upset price.

It seems to me that what that must mean is that this court is somewhat in the same category as the United States Customs Court, whose headquarters is in New York, but it sends single judges all over the United States to hold hearings in matters of customs, violations of the internal revenue laws, or the customs regulations of the country.

In the decisions in those cases, as I recall, the single judge who goes out to hold a hearing, instead of having all the litigants and others involved come to the city of New York, makes a final determination of the facts which he has gathered in the hearing, subject later, of course, if there is any reason for the whole court to pass upon the subject, to have it determined finally by the full court. It seems to me that while the provision authorizes a single judge to act, yet where there is good reason the court as constituted may determine by a majority whether the final determination, socalled, of the single judge shall stand, or whether it shall be reviewed or modified. Am I correct about that?

Mr. AUSTIN. I think the Senator has stated it clearly. Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay the consideration of the bill by my questions, but I think they have a good deal of merit, and I think the Senate should understand what the bill would do, especially as to the jurisdiction conferred. From the statements made by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Montana, and the explanation of the Senator from Kentucky, it occurs to me that the jurisdiction conferred might be thus stated, that full jurisdiction is conferred upon the court as a whole, upon a quorum of the court, or upon a single judge thereof, except as to the express limitations set forth in the bill. Is that correct?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I cannot quite adopt that language. I think, however, I can adopt the thought. In my opinion the same jurisdiction is conferred on each one of those elements named by the Senator from New Mexico, but I think the power differs.

Mr. HATCH. Let us confine it to jurisdiction.

Mr. AUSTIN. I think the jurisdiction is the same. Jurisdiction is conferred on one judge over all the same matters that is conferred on the three judges, excepting those things which are named in the proviso.

Mr. HATCH. The limitation set forth in the measure itself?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am wondering what judgments could be rendered under this procedure, other than those the Senator has mentioned and the nature of which are described in the proviso following the language to which I referred a few minutes ago?

Mr. AUSTIN. There are often leased lines in a railway system, and the relative rights of lessor and lessee arise. Always the trustee, and the receiver in equity, is a mere agent of the court, and before he makes a fundamental change in the relationship of lessor and lessee he goes to the court with a petition asking leave to make the change, and there must be a judgment of the court approving the change before it is valid. Certainly a trustee or a receiver should protect himself always if he can, and he generally does, by a judgment of the court. That is a mere illustration. There are innumerable instances in which an order of a judge is necessary to carry on and keep the trains running, and keep serving the public, as a railroad must do, whether it is in receivership or out of it. The Senator understands that we are dealing with a public servant and with a quasi-public property, and one of the obligations we have in the Congress is to see that we do not stop transportation, that we do not interfere with interstate commerce, but, on the other hand, that we promote it and that we keep the wheels

It is for that purpose that we have facilitated the conduct of business in receiverships and trusteeships by naming one judge to pass upon such matters.

Mr. ELLENDER. Matters incidental to the procedure?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMATHERS in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield. Mr. WALSH. What provision is made in the bill for the printing of the reports or decisions of the court?

Mr. AUSTIN. None, so far as I remember.

Mr. WALSH. Why should there not be such a provision? How is the public, how are the Members of Congress, even, to be able to judge of the soundness of the decisions or the efficiency of the judges?

Mr. AUSTIN. My attention has just been called to a section which makes such provision. I did not remember it, there are so many other things I have been thinking of. It is section 10.

Mr. WALSH. The purpose of the proposed legislation is fundamentally to correct the abuses which have grown up as a result of mismanagement and inefficiency in the handling of receivership cases by receivers?

Mr. AUSTIN. Partly that; but, if the Senator will permit me, I should go further in answering his inquiry and say that a substantial reason for the legislation is the imperfection of the law as it now is. The law as it now undertakes to implement the reorganization of railroads takes out of the hands of the court and puts into the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission judicial power. Too much judicial power is now invested in a tribunal here in Washington which is only a quasi-judicial and quasi-administrative body.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator considers that a major reason for the change?

Mr. AUSTIN. That has been considered a major reason for making the change.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator will agree with me, will he not, that the abuses which have grown up in connection with bankruptcy cases in our courts, favoritism in appointments, excessive fees, and negligence in the handling of the cases, cannot be cured by legislation. It is fundamentally a question of the personnel of the tribunals.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator is exactly right.
Mr. WALSH. So that, so far as the bankruptcy features of the bill are concerned, the selection of new personnel to handle bankruptcy cases may result in a continuation of the same abuses, unless the personnel is of the very highest and most capable character. Even from that standpoint I see an advantage, in that this court will be able to give more personal attention to bankruptcy cases, watch the actions of the receivers, and be more intimately in touch with the operations of the receivers. That impresses me as one of the advantages.

Mr. AUSTIN. Has the Senator observed also that, notwithstanding the weakness of having the court here in Washington, seemingly centralizing all the judicial power in one city of this great continent, there is the advantage that the court will be in the eyes of the people all the time with respect to the reorganization of railroads? As it is now, district judges scattered wherever those who petition for a railroad to go into reorganization may select them, have jurisdiction. How many citizens of this country know what judges now have charge of such reorganizations? Reorganization matters are now in the hands of individual judges. Who are they? Does the public know? Let there be five men here in Washington, and the public will know them all the time.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator has made a very valuable cbservation in referring to the fact that the absence of publicity has been largely responsible for the abuses in the courts in connection with bankruptcy cases. If I had my way, a judge would have to give his reasons in writing for his appointment of a receiver and would have to publicly announce the fee he allowed and the reasons for the fee. because, as the Senator knows, great scandals involving legalized graft have arisen from the courts naming favorites as receivers, and bestowing large and unreasonable and unearned fees upon receivers, not merely in the railroad field but in every other field.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, let me observe that like a little bit of blood in a great amount of water, just one such case creates a very bad impression all over the country. There is thereby cast a cloud upon the whole judicial system which ought not to rest upon it. I think that the practices spoken of do exist in certain places, but, as I have said before on this floor, I do not think the whole judicial structure should be condemned for it.

Mr. WALSH. I am pleased to have the Senator's observation for another reason, because I have been worried about the precedent, especially as the Senator has emphasized the other features of the bill, aside from provision for the handling receiverships in a more adequate and efficient manner. If this is to be a precedent, what is to prevent the workers and employees of the country from asking for a labor court? As the Senator knows, we have passed a large number of very important labor laws in recent years, and various questions are being raised as to their interpretation. There are many untried cases in the courts dealing with labor laws, and it seems that there is a stronger argument for a separate judicial tribunal to deal with human factors and the rights of workers and employees than there is for a court dealing solely with the protection of the monetary interests of those who invest in railroads, which I concede should not be neglected or passed by without our giving them serious consideration. What does the Senator say about the precedent?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I have the same sentiment of devotion to the established Federal and State judicial institutions as has the Senator from Massachusetts. I think we could not come out of New England without very strong | feelings of that kind.

Mr. WALSH. That is true.

Mr. AUSTIN. And I must say that I approached the study of this proposed Federal court legislation with misgivings as to passing it.

Mr. WALSH. What has impressed me very much, let me say to the Senator from Vermont, is that the Senator's judgment in respect to the matter has considerable influence on the floor of the Senate, which is to the Senator's credit

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I do not seek that responsibility and I do not run from it. I have had to meet responsibility in my life many times, and I know the consequences of mistake, and I fear the consequences of mistake in judgment in the present instance. But I have made no hasty decision, I assure Senators, and I do not urge them to follow me. I am supporting the bill because I have become persuaded, after careful consideration, that it is the best we can do at the present time and under the circumstances.

Mr. WALSH. I find myself reaching the same conclusion after much misgiving and many doubts as to the wisdom of the proposed legislation.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the Senator. I now yield to the Senator from Arizona who has just risen.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh] have by their attitude expressed exactly what I would wish to say about the bill. It is the best that may be done in the circumstances.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. I wish to ask another question with respect to the language we were discussing a few moments ago on page 3, as follows:

The chief judge may assign any matter in a procedure to a single judge for final determination.

Suppose a final determination is made, would there be an appeal from such final determination?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; as I understand the bill there are two ways of obtaining such action. That is, they are alternative, and different in some degrees. One of them is provided right at the bottom of the same page. The Senator will see that any interested person can make the appeal.

Mr. ELLENDER. To what court?

Mr. AUSTIN. To the court which is down here at Washington.

Mr. ELLENDER. But to whom would the appeal from the final decision of the single judge be made?

Mr. AUSTIN. To the whole court. Mr. ELLENDER. The whole court?

Mr. AUSTIN. The court in Washington. Suppose a judge in Louisiana made an order in which the Senator was interested. All that has to be done is to transact the business in the manner following:

Provided further, That the court, with a quorum participating, may in its discretion, on application of any interested person, or of its own motion, grant a rehearing or reconsideration by it of the determination of a single judge if sufficient reason therefor be made to appear, but the court may by general rules confine the opportunity to make applications for rehearing or reconsideration to matters or determinations of certain classes or description which in its opinion present issues requiring consideration by a quorum.

Mr. ELLENDER. Will the Senator point out the other language?

Mr. AUSTIN. A review by the Supreme Court is provided for on page 13. That means the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. ELLENDER. As I understand, an appeal will lie from the judgment of a single judge to the whole court and from a judgment of the whole court to the Supreme Court. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I do not intend to prolong the discussion on this bill, but I do believe the Senate is acting too hastily upon such important and intricate legislation. I do not like the idea of creating a special court for the express purpose of handling the legislation of our distressed railroads. I predict that all railroads will seek the jurisdiction of this court on the least pretense. This bill will create a refuge for the railroads, protecting them from the pursuit of their legitimate creditors. What will become of the many lawsuits resulting from a breach of contract or law actions. Will not litigants be compelled to apply to the court herein created for permission to sue? Will they not be obliged to come to Washington for relief? What chances will litigants have with a court whose primary duty it is to preserve the assets of an ailing railroad? I fear that litigants will be forced into compromises which will be disastrous to their just demands.

Mr. President, because of the calamitous predicament in which our railroads now find themselves, it is not my purpose to offer any serious opposition to this bill. My objection thereto lies principally to the creation of the court that will be empowered to deal with the problem. I ask, why could not a commission be created for the purpose of rendering aid, clothed with the authority to investigate and give suggestions, and permit our circuit courts to pronounce judgment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate and open to further amendment.

If there be no further amendment, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILROAD CORPORATIONS IN EQUITY RECEIVERSHIP

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that House bill 5407, to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, be made the unfinished business of the Senate. I do not ask that the bill be taken up for consideration or discussion this afternoon. I merely ask that it be made the unfinished business, so that it may be taken up next Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5407) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments.

COMMISSIONING OF AVIATION CADETS

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now consider House bill 5765, to authorize commissioning aviation cadets in the Naval and Marine Corps Reserves upon completion of training, and for other purposes. I am sure the bill can be disposed of in a few minutes.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if this bill shall be taken up, it will be with the understanding that when it shall have been disposed of the consideration of House bill 5407 will be resumed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5765) to authorize commissioning aviation cadets in the Naval and Marine Corps Reserves upon completion of training, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the purpose of the bill is to authorize commissioning aviation cadets in the Naval Reserve and the Marine Corps Reserve upon completion of training at the naval air station, Pensacola, Fla., and to authorize their retention on active duty for an additional period of 4 years.

In 1935, when the impracticability of securing enough naval aviators from the commissioned line of the Navy to man the increasing aviation forces of the fleet was apparent, the system of aviation cadets was instituted. By this system, aviation cadets were chosen from young men of broad educational background, and after elimination flight training at the several Naval Reserve aviation bases were sent to Pensacola for a course of training. This course at first was 12 months, but is now approximately 14 months.

These young men, once completing satisfactorily the elimination training at the naval aviation bases, were accepted for a period of 4 years, to which they obligated themselves to serve, and were given the rank of aviation cadets in which rank they served throughout their period of active duty. Their pay was fixed at $75 a month while at Pensacola, and $125 a month thereafter, with $1 per day subsistence, and Government life insurance for $10,000 paid for by the Navy out of regular appropriations, and a payment on discharge after their 4 years' service of $1,500.

Experience with these aviation cadets has been uniformly successful. The first group will complete its 4-year period of duty during the next fiscal year. This bill is designed to retain the services of this class of officers on active duty for a longer period of service with the fleet in order to supply experienced aviators needed for the expanding air forces.

The bill in substance provides for the commissioning of aviation cadets as Reserve officers immediately upon the completion of their training at Pensacola and for an optional extension of their service in the fleet beyond the present 4 years' total to a further total of 4 years, without however, any requirement that the officer obligate himself for any given period beyond the original 4 years.

It provides for the advance of these officers from ensign to lieutenant (junior grade) after 3 years' active service after completion of the training course at Pensacola and corresponds therein to the promotion of the line officer from the rank of ensign to the rank of junior lieutenant after 3 years' service. The bill provides for the immediate commissioning as ensigns of those aviation cadets now serving

These provisions exactly duplicate similar provisions in the recent Army law, so that in this respect there is no question of competitive bidding between the services for the best aviation cadet material.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendments reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, page 1, line 4, after "1939", it is proposed to insert "and shall take effect on July 1, 1939", so as to make the section read:

That this act may be cited as the "Naval Aviation Reserve Act of 1939," and shall take effect on July 1, 1939.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 14, page 5, line 23, after the words "transmitted to the", to strike out "Speaker of the House of Representatives" and to insert "Congress", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 14. The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a board of officers of the Navy and Marine Corps to investigate and report upon all matters concerning the regular and reserve aviation personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps. The board shall make such recommendations, including recommendations regarding the enactment of permanent legislation, as it deems appropriate and justified concerning the subject matter herein referred to. The Secretary of the Navy is further directed to cause the report of the board herein authorized to be transmitted to Congress within 10 days of the beginning of the session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, commencing on or about Tanuary 3, 1940.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I do not ask the Senate to adopt the last committee amendment, which adds a new section on page 6 of the bill. I shall ask that the amendment be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add the following new section:

SEC. 15. The insurance granted aviation cadets in accordance with the provisions of the act of April 15, 1935 (49 Stat. 156), and that granted officers who are commissioned pursuant to authority contained in this act shall insure against the death or total permanent disability of the person insured.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that that committee amendment be rejected.

(Legislative day of Friday, May 19, 1939)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou hidden love of God, whose height, whose depth unfathomed, none can know: Speak to our inmost souls, that we may hear Thy voice and feel Thy power in hearts that wait the call to serve the Master and naught else beside. Grant to Thy servants here prophetic insight, that they may know truth as it relates to human life, to the betterment of mankind, and may reveal that temper which refuses to separate between the true and the good and in which every ecstacy of thought makes conscience tremble with awe as the mind quivers with delight. Make them, indeed, prophets of the new day, when, with intrenched wickedness o'erthrown and the chains of oppression broken, the star of peace shall shine upon our world to the honor and praise of Him in whom goodness and wisdom meet and are but one. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Hess, one of his secretaries.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of California, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Senate Joint Resolution 9

Relative to the baneful effects of a reciprocal-trade agreement between the United States of America and Venezuela

Whereas a reciprocal-trade agreement between the United States of America and Venezuela is contemplated and is being considered and hearings have been held before the Committee on Reciprocity Information pursuant to governmental sanction for the purpose of accumulating data and information for the guidance of the committee charged with the drafting of said proposed agreement;

Whereas it appears from the data and information collected as a result of hearings held the principal subject of the proposed reciprocal-trade agreement shall be the importation of crude oil or derivatives manufactured therefrom into the United States of America, produced in the Sovereignty of Venezuela, and the reduc-tion of already inadequate excise taxes and tariffs thereon; and

Whereas there is a great plethora of oil produced in the State of California and other States of the United States of America far beyond demands in either foreign or domestic markets, which is causing great distress in the petroleum industry and economic waste to this State and the Nation; that said conditions have stifled initiative, discouraged further discoveries, and sterilized investments generally throughout the United States in the petroleum industry; and

Whereas in the State of California the distress caused by the overproduction of oil is particularly acute and a constant threat to the well-being and soundness of the industry and the people at large, so that any graduation of tariff or tax on the importation of foreign oil would not only aggravate such distress by encouraging additional importations, with attending competition to California oil, but would be followed by chaos, causing bankruptcy of the industry and those directly or indirectly affected thereby, including the State itself; and

Whereas California in particular is now adversely affected by the present inadequate tariffs and excise taxes enjoyed by importers of foreign oils to the extent that it has suffered a great diminution of markets throughout the United States and practical depriva-tion of its former great market—the eastern seaboard of the United States of America—by reason of the importation of foreign oils uniquely related by similar characteristics to the oil produced in the State of California; and

Whereas by reason of reciprocal-trade agreements and the inclu-sion of the most-fewered-nation clause in said agreements a

sion of the most-favored-nation clause in said agreements a reciprocal-trade agreement made with Venezuela subjecting petroleum or its derivatives to graduated tariffs or decreased excise taxes leum or its derivatives to graduated tariffs or decreased excise taxes would be applicable and available equally to all other oil-producing nations enjoying reciprocal-trade agreements with the United States, thereby permitting the indiscriminate dumping of foreign oil on an already surfeited domestic market of the United States under the same provisions as would be accorded Venezuela under the proposed reciprocal-trade agreement; and

Whereas prudence dictates that our State and National defense be strengthened by the development of domestic resources as a measure of preparedness for war; the dumping of foreign oil on the domestic market would not only discourage and stifle domestic development but would encourage development of oil reserves in foreign countries that would become weapons in inimical hands in times of conflict; and times of conflict: and

Whereas any graduation of tariff or decrease in excise tax would not only endanger the billions of dollars invested in California oil fields and the facilities installed to treat, handle, and market the same, but labor and the whole economic structure of the State and same, but labor and the whole economic structure of the State and the Nation itself would be deleteriously affected thereby. Any impetus given to the importation of foreign oil not only affects domestic, economic, and social conditions of those actively engaged in the industry, but likewise affects the financial and national ability to obtain required money from taxation. Oil produced in foreign countries is uniformly carried in foreign bottoms to the detriment of American shipping, shipbuilding, and American labor otherwise employable in that industry. It affords a stimulus for the employment of cheap foreign labor and an incentive for the building of foreign ships for transportation that become auxiliaries to foreign navies in times of war, creating not only a pronounced threat to our own Navy and the national defense but an incentive threat to our own Navy and the national defense but an incentive for potential belligerents to establish shipyards, fabricate tankers that may become auxiliaries to potentially inimical navies, to the detriment of our own nationals: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California jointly. That the Congress of the United States of America be reproduced to enact legislation particularly exampling from and memorialized to enact legislation particularly exempting from, and prohibiting the inclusion of crude oil produced in a foreign country, or any derivative manufactured from crude oil produced in a foreign country to come within, the purview of any treaty or trade agreement between the United States of America and any foreign country, which would in any manner, directly or indirectly, influence or encourage or condone the importation of crude oil produced in a foreign country, or any derivative manufactured from such crude oil, into the United States of America, or any Territory or dependency thereof, and be it further. ency thereof; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States of America be further memorialized to enact legislation either to increase substantially the current tariff or excise tax on the importation of oil produced in foreign countries and derivatives manufactured therefrom and imported into the United States of America, or any Territory or dependency thereof, or to prevent and prohibit entirely and effectually by way of embargo the importation of oil produced in foreign countries, or derivatives manufactured from oil produced in foreign countries, into the United States of America, or any Territorian Countries, into the United States of America, or any Territorian Countries, into the United States of America, or any Territorian Countries, into the United States of America, or any Territorian Countries, into the United States of America, or any Territorian Countries of Coun tory or dependency thereof, for any purpose whatsoever; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be transmitted Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be transmitted by the secretary of state of the State of California to the President of the United States of America, to the Secretary of State of the United States of America, the Secretary of the Senate of the United States of America, the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, and each Senator and each Member of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, and to the Committee on Reciprocity Information, and that they are respectfully urged to accomplish the purpose of this memorial.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution of Local No. 149, United Federal Workers of America (affiliated with the C. I. O.), Veterans' Administration Facility, Palo Alto, Calif., favoring the prompt enactment of the bill (S. 1314) to provide for the hearing and disposition of employee appeals from discriminatory treatment by superiors in the Federal service, which was referred to the Committee on the Civil Service.

He also laid before the Senate a statement and resolution of the Southern Governors' Conference, held at Memphis, Tenn., May 20, 1939, favoring a prompt public congressional investigation of the personnel and policies of those administering the wage and hour law; that such investigation disclose the name, home address, place of birth, and voting residence, organizations with which affiliated, past and present, other than religious, and the background of training, experience, viewpoint, conduct, and attitude of each; and that following completion of the proposed investigation such reorganization of the personnel and policies of the administration of the wage and hour law be effected as will guarantee a proper administration of that law in terms of the legislative intent and the true objective of the act, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram from Clerks' Lodge No. 511 and Freight Handlers' Local (B. & O. Railroad), of Baltimore, Md., signed by C. M. Machin, committeeman, and A. W. Shipley, secretary, requesting that the socalled Reed amendment be eliminated from the bill (S. 2009) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by extending its application to additional types of carriers and transportation and modifying certain provisions thereof, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MEAD presented a petition of sundry citizens of Franklin, Malverne, and Valley Stream, N. Y., favoring a policy of strict neutrality on the part of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. HATCH, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 1558) to provide for granting to the State of New Mexico an easement with respect to certain lands in New Mexico, reported it with amendments.

RAILROAD CORPORATIONS IN EQUITY RECEIVERSHIP

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5407) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supple-

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, this bill, which has passed the House of Representatives, proposes to amend the Bankruptcy Act of 1938 relating to the bankruptcy of railroads. It passed the House almost, if not quite, unanimously and came over to the Senate. The Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce have amended it in several particulars so as to protect the public interest, as we felt, and also to throw around investors certain safeguards which we considered were needed in the bill.

There was some objection to the bill from some of the departments, they feeling that if the bill in its present form were passed it would throw it open to all the railroads of the country, whether they were in receivership or whether they were in bankruptcy, to try to organize under the provisions of this bill. Really, this is an emergency measure, and was first drafted and introduced at the request of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad for the purpose of taking care of an emergency situation with reference to that particular railroad. We have limited its application so that it will apply to two railroads which have already had the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

As the bill is proposed to be amended by the Interstate Commerce Committee we feel that the public interest will be protected; we likewise feel that the investors' interests will be protected; and, as the bill now stands, we feel it is a good measure.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield. Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand, one of the railroads has secured from its security holders approximately 80 percent of the securities, so that they can be managed in such a way as not to impair the private operation of the road; but that if this proposed legislation authorizing them to act shall not be passed, what the security holders are voluntarily willing to do will not be permitted to be done, and the road may be in even worse circumstances than it is at the present time. Is that correct?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will proceed to state the amendments reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The first amendment of the Committee on Interstate Commerce was, under the heading "Chapter XV-Railroad Adjustments, article II—Definitions", on page 2, line 13, after the word "act", to strike out "including" and insert "excluding", and in line 14, after the word "receivership", to insert "or in proceedings for reorganization under section 77 of this act",

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," as amended, is hereby further amended by adding thereto a new chapter, to be designated chapter XV, and to read as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, there are two typographical errors which should be corrected. On page 3, line 25, after the word "which", I move to strike out the comma and the word "before."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. On page 4, line 2, after the numerals "1939", I move to insert the word "prepared."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana for his opinion regarding a matter which has come to my attention in some other committee hearings. While it has no bearing upon this bill, it would be, it seems to me, of substantial value to the railroads in connection with the tremendous problem and responsibility of reorganization. I wish to submit the idea to the Senator from Montana and see what he has to say about it.

If the railroads were permitted to buy their own bonds at the depreciated market prices without having to pay a tax upon the difference between the purchase price and par, they could rather painlessly, in many instances, reorganize their own debt structure. What would the Senator have to say about that?

Mr. WHEELER. I have had the matter referred to by the Senator from Michigan under consideration and have discussed it. So far as the tax is concerned, I would have no objection to removing it; and think it would probably be a desirable thing to do. I was rather enamored of the idea of the railroads buying their own securities, but in talking it over with experts both of the railroads and in the departments and outside the departments, there seem to be some difficulties which would have to be overcome before I would want to commit myself definitely to the proposal. I think, however, perhaps it could be done.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I was impressed with the fact in the testimony that was submitted to us that the actual market value of these securities today is just about at the point where the experts say the railroads could survive if they could acquire them without the tax.

Mr. WHEELER. That is right.

Mr. VANDENBERG. So that any voluntary progress that could be made back toward a lower level, it seems to me, ought to be encouraged.

Mr. WHEELER. I think so; and if something could be worked out so that the other securities holders would be properly protected, I would see no objection to it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Michigan to what tax he referred.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I referred to the capital-gains tax. Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to say along that line that one of the railways in my own city of Baltimore wants to buy its bonds and has been steadily buying them and has been getting the railway on a sound basis; but the trouble is that the taxes are so high that they have practically prohibited, even with the consent of the stockholders and the bondholders, the reorganization of the railway.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I take it from the Senator's observation that he would be somewhat in sympathy with the idea

I have submitted.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the idea is a good one. A way ought to be found to allow the roads to reorganize voluntarily when the stockholders and the bondholders and the public are all taken into consideration and protected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engressment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

ORDER FOR CONSIDERATION OF UNOBJECTED-TO BILLS ON CALENDAR

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected-to bills on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected-to bills on the calendar?

Mr. KING. I have no objection provided we may have a call of the roll, because there are a number of Senators who did not anticipate that the calendar would be called.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in order that Senators may be present, I had intended to make the point of no quorum, so that Senators could be called to the Chamber, and I now do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none.

The Senator from Kentucky suggests the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

EFFECT OF WAGE AND HOUR LAW ON SOUTHERN INDUSTRIES

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD and desire to direct the attention of the Senate to a resolution recently adopted by the Southern Governors Conference with reference to the Wage and Hour Act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to say that at the time the Wage and Hour Act was under consideration there were in this body some who dared to say that the measure would result in the crucifixion of many southern industries. We dared to say that, though we knew very well that there were in the country those who could easily turn upon us and say that we wanted low wages in southern industry. Those of us who made the fight against the wage and hour bill did not want low wages in southern industry; but we knew very well the handicaps under which we were laboring in the South, and we knew very well what the administration of the Wage and Hour Act would do to many southern industries. We, therefore, had the courage to tell our people the truth.

During the fight on that bill the southern Governors, meeting here in conference, adopted a resolution demanding a floor under wages and a ceiling on hours, thereby contributing so far as they could to the undoing of those of us who were making a fight for the South and for the industries of the South. The Southern Governors Conference by resolution demands, and I ask the Senate to consider it:

1) That we urge upon the Members of Congress an immediate (1) That we urge upon the Members of Congress an immediate public congressional investigation of the personnel and policies of those administering the wage and hour law. That such investigation disclose the name, home address, place of birth, and voting residence, organizations with which affiliated, past and present, other than religious, and the background of training, experience, viewpoint, conduct, and attitude of each.

(2) That following the completion of such investigation such reorganization of the personnel and policies of the administration of the wage and hour law be effected as will guarantee a proper administration of the wage and hour law in terms of the legislative intent and the true objective of the act.

(3) That the secretary of the conference is hereby instructed to forward a copy of this action of the conference to the President of the United States, the Wage and Hour Administrator, the President of the United States Senate, and the Speaker of the United States Payment of the United States Senate, and the Speaker of the United Stat States House of Representatives-

And so forth. Mr. President, in my opposition to the Wage and Hour Act as passed I did not stand for low wages. Wages cannot be fixed and maintained without regard to economic conditions. It is impossible to maintain wages by mere law without destroying jobs for the workers.

Throughout the South many small industries are idle. Throughout the South many small industries have closed since this law went into effect, not because the management did not desire to pay good wages but because the management could not pay the wages required by the act.

Mr. President, the South has many industries the labor in which has been trained in the South. Those industries have accumulated many inefficient workers in the course of the years. Be it said to the eternal credit of the management of those industries that they have not desired to deprive those inefficient or underaverage workers of employment. They never did so until the law compelled them to do so.

The wage and hour law is, of course, administered by men who know nothing of the conditions in the South, who do not understand or appreciate the conditions under which our industries have been built up. I am not disposed to think that they are maladministering the law, as the Conference of Southern Governors now say. I am disposed to think that they are carrying out the law, not always with a sympathetic understanding of facts and conditions, but they are endeavoring to carry out the law as it was written. The law as written really takes no account of varying conditions in a country as wide and as broad as these United States. The law disregards cost of maintaining one's self under economic and climatic conditions which widely differ in this country.

Those of us who opposed the law when it was before Congress pointed out that the South was suffering and that her industries were suffering under the most iniquitous regional freight-rate structure any great country ever endured. We knew that there was scant hope that any remedy would be provided for that situation.

Mr. President, I can point to cotton oil mills in the South, the one- and two-press mills, in which the employee is at work only about 13 minutes out of the half hour. For practically 30 minutes out of the hour he is idle because from the beginning of the process in the small oil mills to the end of the process, the crushing, the cooking, and the extracting of the oil, approximately only 13 minutes out of every 30 are required. The employee cannot leave his machine, however. He must remain there, because at the tick of the clock a second process commences, and he must attend to it. What is the result? Many of the little two-press cotton oil mills in the South have closed down. Their labor has gone on relief, or it is walking the roads without work.

Can we expect the Administrator of the wage and hour law to understand that situation? If it were a 6-press mill, or a 14-press mill, the labor would be busy every second of every 30-minute period throughout the whole working day. But they cannot make a differential under the law. They cannot say that this is a situation which we will care for.

So, what is the result? The law must be enforced, and these people are out of work.

Mr. President, I could stand here and cite instance after instance of legitimate industry paying a legitimate wage to efficient workers, and yet that industry has ceased to exist, because it cannot put its products into the comsuming markets in competition with like industry in other parts of this country, and because the economic facts which enter into its life as an industry have been ignored, not as the Conference of Southern Governors think, through poor and maladministration of the law by Mr. Andrews and those associated with him, but by the law itself.

If the Wage Hour Act, coupled with certain other acts of the Congress which have taken no due consideration of varying differences in this country, of varying economic conditions, which cannot be ignored, had been in effect 50 years ago, there would not today be a single national industry south of the Potomac River save those industries which had to go there because the raw material was there, or because climatic conditions demanded the establishment of the indus-

I invite the reading of this resolution of the Governors. The immediate cause of the resolution is this: Under the Wage and Hour Act in October of this year the minimum wage will be set up from 25 to 30 cents an hour, and the hours reduced from 44 to 42 hours a week in the textile industry. But the law itself provided for industry committees, and industry committees have been set up. An industry committee was set up for the textile industry, and that industry committee has recommended a higher wage than the 30 cents which would become effective in October. That committee has recommended a wage of 321/2 cents an hour, effective in July or at some date between now and the effective date fixed in the act. If that rate goes into effect, not all of the southern textile mills, by any means, will go out of business, but many small mills in the rural areas, in the small communities, will close.

The monopoly committee is wondering what is happening. The monopoly committee wants to know why monopoly is taking a stronger and stronger hold upon the throat of American business. This is one of the reasons. When all of the small textile units of the South are driven out, only the large and well-financed units in the industry will survive, and that will tend to create a monopoly, at least in the South.

Mr. President, every one in the South wants to see higher wages paid. No section of the country has made more rapid progress in advancing the wage scale. Certainly none desire to advance it faster. Surely the South is not to be criticized, because under conditions which actually exist, not under some fancied Utopian conditions, into which this law might fit in one section of the country as well as another, but under the conditions as they really exist it is impracticable if not impossible to pass a uniform law, rigid in its terms, with no flexibility, which can be administered without working a great deal of hardship upon the industries in the South. That is what has happened.

Mr. President, I wish to repeat, I am offering the resolution for the RECORD in its entirety because I desire to have Senators read it. But I do not share the view expressed by the Conference of Southern Governors that the trouble is a result of maladministration of the law by Mr. Andrews and those associated with him. My experience with Administrator Andrews, except in his too narrow definition of "area of production," has been that he has endeavored to meet a situation which he could not meet under the nonflexible, rigid terms of the Wage and Hour Act. My experience has been that Mr. Andrews has leaned backward wherever he could do so to make the law workable. I do not think it would be fair to insert the resolution in the Congressional RECORD without saying positively that I do not think the criticism aimed at the Administrator is entirely justified.

I ask that the resolution adopted by the Conference of Southern Governors be printed in its entirety.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A STATEMENT AND RESOLUTION BY THE SOUTHERN GOVERNORS CONFER-ENCE, PEABODY HOTEL, MEMPHIS, TENN., MAY 20, 1939

The Conference of Southern Governors calls attention to the following facts:

The National Tariff Commission was born out of a conception that tariffs would protect and encourage the development of infant American industry. The Interstate Commerce Commission was born out of an equally high conception of public duty for the purpose of guaranteeing that railroad investments would receive a fair return, while at the same time the shipper was to be protected against the payment of more than a fair freight rate. Monopolistic against the payment of more than a fair freight rate. Monopolistic interests have succeeded in defeating the high purpose of both of these measures, to the economic disadvantage of all the vast population of our Nation west of the Mississippi and south of the Ohio River, while at the same time the consuming public within the territory east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio pay penalties that augment concentrated wealth.

By virtue of the meldministration of these measures the nor

By virtue of the maladministration of these measures the per capita wealth of the citizens in the vast expanses of the southern and western parts of the United States is substantially below the national average. This condition is such that correction, if not impossible, can be accomplished only after most strenuous and expensive effort.

However, as progress is becoming apparent in the effort to correct this maladministration, particularly of the Interstate Commession Act, we find ourselves confronted with the impending, if not presently accomplished, maladministration of another measif not presently accomplished, maladministration of another measure born of equally worthy motives. The wage and hour law is recognized by the Southern Governors Conference as a measure intended to accomplish social justice. Its fine purpose to put a floor under wages and a ceiling over hours was approved by this conference on January 7, 1938, prior to the enactment of the law. The legislation had as its main objective the escape from a combination of intolerable hours and wages. There is no question but that benefits have been derived from the passage of this legislation. These benefits have accrued because of the law, however, and in spite of inefficient and incompetent administration of the act, which maladministration, unless corrected, will cause the present gains to be lost and will, indeed, finally destroy the very objective of the act be lost and will, indeed, finally destroy the very objective of the act

An analysis of the background of training, experience, viewpoint, and present conduct and attitude of the personnel charged with the administration of this act brings the Southern Governors' Conferadministration of this act brings the Southern Governors' Conference to the inescapable conclusion that it is the purpose of the present personnel to pervert the purposes of this act from the accomplishment of social justice to the nullification of gains recently made in efforts to modify discriminatory freight differentials. It is therefore the conclusion of the Southern Governors' Conference that the merest sense of duty and responsibility to national welfare demands of the Congress that it make an investigation of the personnel charged with the administration of the wage and hour law for the purpose of guaranteeing that the legislative intent will be the motivating force in the administration of the law; that following such investigation proper steps be taken to compel the selection of such personnel as can and will properly carry out the selection of such personnel as can and will properly carry out the intent and purposes of the act.

The wage and hour law specifically contemplates that the actual basic facts surrounding a given enterprise, its location, and its handicaps be reckoned with in effecting differentials to the enterprise so that the actual source of employment of labor will not be destroyed. We point as an illustration of the maladministration of this law that no such factors have been taken into consideration, and that as a result of that maladministration workers in various sections of the country are facing unemployment and may have actually become unemployed and placed on relief rolls because of the forced shutting down of small business enterprises. While not expressing approval or disapproval, we point to the significant fact that when these workers are thrown out of employment as a result of such maladministration and are forced upon work projects of the Federal Government they immediately encounter a wage differential despite the fact that such differential is not recognized in the present administration of the wage and hour law.

We again affirm that we want to get as high wages for the workers in all sections of the country, including our own, as can possibly be in all sections of the country, including our own, as can possibly be paid, but a failure to recognize the existing discriminatory differentials will inevitably destroy the source of employment.

In view of the above facts the conference resolves:

(1) That we urge upon the Members of Congress an immediate public congressional investigation of the personnel and policies of those administering the wage and hour law. That such investigation disclose the name, home address, place of birth, and voting residence, organizations with which affiliated, past and present, other than religious, and the background of training, experience, viewpoint, conduct, and attitude of each.

(2) That following the completion of such investigation such reorganization of the personnel and policies of the administration of the wage and hour law be effected as will guarantee a proper administration of the wage and hour law in terms of the legislative intent and the true objective of the act.

lative intent and the true objective of the act.

(3) That the secretary of the conference is hereby instructed to forward a copy of this action of the conference to the President of the United States, the Wage and Hour Administrator, the President of the United States Senate, and the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, with the request that the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House cause same to be read in open session of their respective Houses of Congress, and that it be placed in the Congressional Record. That a copy be mailed to each Member of Congress and each Senator from the States within the conference. That copies be released to the press.

Mr. ANDREWS subsequently said: Mr. President, I hold in my hand an amendment to the rulings issued on April 19 last by Elmer F. Andrews, Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor. This has reference to his construction of that portion of the wage and hour law regarding "area production." The ruling on that provision, in my judgment, militates severely against agricultural products, and particularly fruit and vegetables and other perishable products which move in commerce.

"Area of production" was never intended by Congress to include persons engaged in growing, packing, picking, and processing fruits and vegetables whose labors must always depend upon the weather. The weather determines generally the number of hours, and very often the amount of pay. A bill has been introduced by my colleague at this session which will undertake to correct this construction.

I ask that this ruling of the Administrator of the wage and hour law appear in the RECORD, following the resolution of the Conference of Southern Governors, which has just been presented by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. George].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Title 29, labor; ch. V, Wage and Hour Division]

PART 536. REGULATIONS DEFINING THE TERM "AREA OF PRODUCTION" AS USED IN SECTION 7 (C) AND IN SECTION 13 (A) (10) OF THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT

The following amendment to regulations—part 536—(regulations defining the term "area of production" as used in sec. 7 (c) and in sec. 13 (a) (10) of the Fair Labor Standards Act) is hereby issued. This amendment amends section 536.2 by adding an alternative paragraph No. "(e)" applicable to perishable or seasonal fresh fruits and vegetables. Said amendment shall become effective upon my signing the original and upon the publication thereof in the Federal Register, and shall be in force and effect until repealed by regulations hereafter made and published.

Signed at Washington, D. C., this 19th day of April 1939.

ELMER F. Andresws,

Administrator, Wage and Hour Division,

"Area of production" as used in section 13 (a) (10) of the Fair Labor Standards Act: An individual shall be regarded as employed in the "area of production" within the meaning of section 13 (a) (10), in handling, packing, storing, ginning, compressing, pasteurizing, drying, preparing in their raw or natural state, or canning of agricultural or horticultural commodities for market, or in making cheese or butter or other dairy products; of such beans into standard commercial grades for marketing in their raw or natural state. handling, packing, storing, and drying such tobacco for market in an establishment which is a first concentration point for such tobacco. As used in this subsection (e), "open country" or "rural community" shall not include any city or town of 2,500 or greater population according to the Fifteenth United States Census, 1930, and "immediate locality" shall not include any distance of more than 10 miles.

[U. S. Department of Labor, Wage and Hour Division, Washington]

AREA OF PRODUCTION REDEFINED FOR FRESH FRUIT AND VEGETABLES

Administrator Elmer F. Andrews announced today a redefinition of the much-disputed "area of production" phrase of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The new definition exempts from the wage and hour provisions of the act employees engaged in the canning, packing, and storing of fresh fruits and vegetables who are employed in establishments situated in the open country or in towns of less than 2,500 and which draw all their products from within a radius of 10 miles.

In issuing the regulation the Administrator said:

'I have given careful consideration to the record made at the hearing held before me on April 3 and 4 on the question of amending section 536.2 of regulations, part 536, defining the term 'area of production' as applied to fresh fruits and vegetables. I have also carefully reconsidered the legislative history of section 13 (a) (10), in order to ascertain the congressional intent.

"There are approximately 325 000 employees angeond in the fresh

"There are approximately 325,000 employees engaged in the fresh fruits and vegetables industry. The employers generally have been demanding a definition of 'area of production' which will be so broad as to exempt practically all of the employees in the industry. Labor, on the other hand, urges a definition so narrow in scope as virtually to exempt no one.

"It is of primary importance to avoid discrimination between competitors engaged in similar operations and between the same classes of labor. The definition issued today will, in my opinion, produce a minimum of discrimination and economic dislocation.

"Upon the basis of the consideration which I have given both to the record made at the hearing before me and to the language and intent of section 13 (a) (10), the only sound definition which the act and the facts permit me to issue is one that requires a canning plant or packing house to draw its products from the immediate producing area and to be located in the open country or in a rural town of small population. Accordingly, the amendment to the reg-ulations just issued exempts employees engaged in the canning. packing, and storing of fresh fruits and vegetables who are employed in establishments situated in the open country or in towns of less than 2,500 and which draw all their products from within a radius of 10 miles.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am delighted to hear the remarks of the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. George]. I wish that the Members of this body could visit my State and see the disastrous effect of the application of the wage and hour law on small industries which were struggling to carry on. He has mentioned specifically the textile industry. I am intimately conversant with the lumbering business in my State. It is more or less complicated in a way, but certain individuals during the slack period on the farm take from commercial men contracts for logging. Others take contracts to deliver lumber which has been cut by local mills to those who process it. Under the terms of the act they are all "out" because the wages they must pay under the provisions of the law are so high that they simply cannot continue to operate. Those employers were making a living. but they were not making any profit. They were giving employment where otherwise the laborers would be idle. In other words, as the Senator from Georgia has said, in as complex a condition as must exist over the vast territory of America it is absurd to think that we can make a uniform, rigid law to apply to all the conditions that may exist. The act is destructive of competition and is encouraging monopoly. Anyone who reads the act must come to that conclusion.

I sometimes wonder if we have not done a real hurt to labor by the passage of the wage and hour law. I do not mean organized labor, but I mean those millions who are not in any labor organization and who may never be in a labor organization, but who come under the terms of that act. I believe that under the spur of certain organized political influences we have done more damage within 24 hours by reason of the universal application of the wage and hour law than we may be able to undo in a generation.

America was built up and became prosperous because of the freedom of individuals and the freedom of businessmen.

I shall not stand in the Senate and say that there have not been some grave injustices done to the laboring man by certain representatives of organized capital. I hold no brief for such representatives of capital, and I think such conditions ought to be corrected. But, Mr. President, in order to correct a bad situation a blanket bill was passed which has had the effect of throttling individual effort. It has applied to an infant company, for which the ground work of its future hope is being laid, a rigid law which should apply only to well-entrenched organizations whose profits are large.

That was not the effect of the wage-hour law. By that law Congress has throttled everybody and everything. Congress has throttled infant industries and made it impossible for them to meet the conditions existing in industry.

Thousands of small industries have sprung up all over the southern part of our country, which is still virgin territory, where much timber is to be found and where there is a kind climate. The development of the southern section of the country, however, has been held in abeyance for 75 years because of the disasters incident to a great, horrible, fratricidal war, but gradually we were coming back. No people in the history of civilization have ever borne what the people of my section have borne and still continued to exist, still retained their spirits. But from time to time Congress has passed laws which have blighted the hopes of millions and encouraged the very practices Congress was seeking to control.

Mr. President, I think there has not been a law passed, to my knowledge, since I have been a Member of the Senate which has had the blighting and disastrous effect that the present wage and hour law has had. Had we been specific and applied it to those industries which we knew, or had the power to discover, were making tremendous profits, while they were exploiting their employees, it would have been well, but we did not do that. We enacted a law which covers all employers engaged in the production of goods which enter into interstate commerce, and flung the dragnet and dragged to destruction thousands of small industries throughout my section of the country.

Mr. President, no man can say that I have not in all my 30 years in the Senate been a practical friend of labor. I have done all I could to help the man who does the behest of the representatives of capital. He is entitled to his share of the wealth which he helps produce. But we are discouraging enterprises all over the country in our senseless obeisance to what is known as the labor element. I am going to help them all I can along the right lines, but I take this opportunity to enter my protest against the absurd wage and hour law.

SPANISH WAR TRAVEL PAY

The bill (H. R. 289) for the relief of officers and soldiers of the Volunteer Service of the United States mustered into service for the War with Spain and who were held in service in the Philippine Islands after the ratification of the treaty of peace, April 11, 1899, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. CAPPER subsequently said: Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement with respect to House bill 289.

I hope the Senate will consider and pass without delay H. R. 289, the so-called Spanish War travel pay bill, and thereby have a creditable part in discharging an obligation to a group of the Nation's veterans which has existed for 40 years. That this debt should have remained unpaid for nearly half a century is, I think, a glaring example of our lack of appreciation of loyal and patriotic service on the part of our volunteer soldiers.

During the War with Spain there were several regiments of volunteer soldiers in active service in the Philippine Islands. They rendered valiant service under most trying circumstances. Among those troops was the Twentieth Kansas Infantry. No finer soldiers ever wore the Nation's uniform than the men who made up the membership of that regiment.

Under the law, men who enlisted for service in the War with Spain entered the service for the duration of the war. Likewise under the law and under the terms of their enlistment they were entitled to be discharged upon the close of the war and were entitled to receive travel pay and subsistence from the Philippine Islands to their homes, or to the points in the United States where they were mustered into the service.

However, technically these Volunteer soldiers were not discharged upon the completion of their enlistment. An emergency existed. The Philippine soldiers, some thirty or forty thousand of them, under the command of General Aguinaldo, who had been our friends, were now our enemies. They were demanding the freedom of their country and were attempting to retake Manila and the Philippine Islands, which came into our possession as a result of the War with Spain. It was impossible for the few Regular Army soldiers in the Philippine Islands at that time to cope with the situation. It was apparent that it would be necessary to have the service of Volunteer soldiers to meet that tense situation.

Early in March 1899, the Secretary of War, who, it was understood, was speaking for President McKinley, communicated with General Otis, in command of the American forces in the Philippines, and made inquiry as to whether or not the Volunteer soldiers in the islands would consent to reenlist for a period of not to exceed 6 months until the existing situation could be cleared up or replacements could be provided for them. General Otis made inquiry of these Volunteers as to whether they would reenlist under the circumstances, providing they were granted travel pay and subsistence. They agreed to do so. On March 25, 1899, a general advance against the insurrectionsists was ordered, and these men went into action. They were under heavy fire, and endured great hardships. Many of them were killed, and others were wounded. All rendered valiant and patriotic service to the Nation.

The treaty of peace with Spain was accomplished on April 11, 1899. The Volunteer troops, under the terms of their enlistment, were entitled to their discharge and their travel pay at that time. However, they were in the field on that day and in active service against the enemy. Naturally, it was impractical to provide for their formal discharge from the service and their muster in for the new enlistment. However, they willingly continued in the service and performed their patriotic duty with the assurance from their commanding general that they would be granted travel pay and subsistence as promised.

Upon the completion of their additional enlistment, however, these soldiers were dismayed to find that Congress had appropriated no funds for their travel pay and that the Government was standing on the technicality that they had not been formally discharged and reenlisted. Technically that is correct. But these men did not stand on a technicality when they agreed to render service to the Nation beyond their terms of enlistment. They performed their part of a contract into which they felt they had entered with their Government, and had a right to feel that the Government would perform its part of the contract. I agree with this position on the part of these soldiers and feel that they were then and are now entitled to their travel pay and subsistence.

It does us no credit as a people that the debt to these men has remained unpaid for more than 40 years. It is an honest debt. It is not a gratuity, as some have suggested. These men are not pleading for a gratuity. They are merely asking that even at this late date the Government discharge an obligation to them which it assumed nearly half a century ago. I think their cause is a just one and, as I said at the outset, I very much hope that the Congress will now pass the necessary legislation to provide for the payment of the debt to these men who served their Nation willingly and valiantly.

The bill has twice passed the Senate in previous sessions and now comes to us from the House, where it had no opposition.

I hope the Senator from Utah [Mr. King] will withdraw his objection to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it is true, as stated by the Senator, that the Senate has upon two occasions passed bills substantially the same as the one under consideration. The first of these two measures passed in the Senate in 1935 and was vetoed by the President of the United States. With a slight amendment, the second bill was passed in 1938. The purpose of the bills was the same as the purpose of the pending measure. My attention was called to the first measure after it was passed following the veto of the same by the President. I then conferred with the officials of the War Department and reached the conclusion that the President was right in the position which he took. When the second bill was under consideration in the Senate, I opposed it, assigning the position of the President in vetoing the measure as ample justification for my opposition to the same. As indicated, the second bill was vetoed by the President and in his veto message he referred to his former veto message.

In my opinion, there are further reasons than those assigned by the President in support of his position. In view of the action of the President in vetoing the two bills, it is certain that if this bill were to pass it would again be vetoed by the President. In view of this fact, I think the bill should be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over. Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer as a part of my remarks the veto message of the President dated June 20, 1938. This veto message contains the veto message of the President dated September 2, 1935.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The message is as follows:

MEMORANDUM OF DISAPPROVAL

I have withheld my approval of the bill H. R. 2904, for the relief of officers and soldiers of the Volunteer Service of the United States mustered into service for the War with Spain and who were held in service in the Philippine Islands after the ratification of the treaty of peace, April 11, 1899.

The effect of this bill is that a certain class of the approximately 15,000 volunteers "shall be entitled to the travel pay and allowance for subsistence provided in sections 1289 and 1290, Revised Statutes, as then amended and in effect, as though discharged April 11, 1899, by reason of expiration of enlistment, and appointed or reenlisted April 12, 1899, without deduction of travel pay and subsistence paid by reason of expiration of enlistment, and appointed or reenlisted April 12, 1899, without deduction of travel pay and subsistence paid such officers or soldiers on final muster out subsequent to April 11, 1899." In this bill is a proviso "that no benefits shall accrue under any provision of this act to any person whose claim is based upon the service of any such officer or soldier discharged in the Philippine Islands at his own request."

With the exception of the above-quoted proviso, H. R. 2904 is identical with H. R. 2024, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, which I disapproved on September 2, 1935, at which time I made the following statement:

"I have disapproved H. R. 2024, 'An act for the relief of officers and soldiers of the Volunteer Service of the United States mustered into service for the War with Spain and who were held in service in the Philippine Islands after the ratification of the treaty of peace, in the Philippine Islands after the ratification of the treaty of peace, April 11, 1899.'

"The effect of this bill is that the beneficiaries thereof 'shall be entitled to the travel pay and allowance for subsistence provided in sections 1289 and 1290, Revised Statutes, as then amended and in effect, as though discharged April 11, 1899, by reason of expiration of enlistment, and appointed or reenlisted April 12, 1899, without deduction of travel pay and subsistence paid such officers or soldiers on final muster out subsequent to April 11, 1899.

"I am advised by the Secretary of War that there were approximately 15,000 officers and soldiers of the volunteer forces of the United States in the Philippine Islands at the conclusion of peace with the Kingdom of Spain who would become beneficiaries of this act.

"The Comptroller General in his report on February 23, 1935, advises that the enactment of this bill would authorize payment of travel pay at the rate of 1 day's pay and 1 ration for each 20 miles, inclusive of the distance by water from the Philippine Islands to San Francisco, approximately 8,000 miles, and that such payments for the water travel alone will exceed 1 year's pay plus 1 day's ration for each day of such period. It is estimated the cost of the legislation will approximate $7,000,000.

"Congress has heretofore recognized the service of these officers 'Congress has heretofore recognized the service of these officers and men by the award of a special medal, and there was also an allowance by the act of Congress approved January 12, 1899, of 2 months' extra pay to all volunteers who served honestly and faithfully beyond the continental limits of the United States. I join most heartly in recognizing and appreciating the patriotic service of these men.

"However, approval of this bill would result in the payment of a gratuity to each of the officers and men concerned, in an amount exceeding his pay for a full year, plus the value of rations for the period involved in sea travel from the Philippines to the United States, a benefit utterly without warrant, since each individual concerned has already received transportation and subsistence at Government expense for the journey performed in addition to full new for the active time. pay for the entire time.

"I have recently signed an act restoring pensioners of the War with Spain and Philippine Insurrection to their full rate of pension. I feel that no breach of trust has been committed by the Government as regards the men who served their country in the War with Spain and Philippine Insurrection, and from the facts in this case general legislation upon this subject as provided in H. R. 2024 is not deemed advisable."

I am informed by the Secretary of War that there is no informa-tion available upon which an estimate of the number of beneficiaries tion available upon which an estimate of the number of beneficiaries entitled to the travel pay and allowance for subsistence under the provisions of the act can be determined, and it is not understood how the proponents of the legislation have estimated that approximately 7,000 of the officers and soldiers of the State Volunteers have died leaving no widow, children, father, or mother. I find no change in the beneficiaries affected by H. R. 2904, other than the proviso that no benefits shall accrue under any provision of the act to any person whose claim is based upon the service of any such officer or soldier discharged in the Philippine Islands at his own request, and I am informed by the Secretary of War also that this proviso would affect approximately 2 percent of the 15,000 volunteers who served in the Philippine Islands, or only about 300.

Moreover, the enactment of H. R. 2904 into law would establish an Moreover, the enactment of H. R. 2904 into law would establish an undesirable precedent under which approximately 4,400 members of the Regular Army rendering similar service could demand with equal justice that legislation be enacted in their behalf and in whose behalf a similar bill, H. R. 2279, was introduced in the first session of the present Congress.

The Secretary of War strongly recommends that this bill be not favorably considered, and I find nothing new in the facts of the case which would justify different action on my part.

PERPETUATION OF THE EASTERN WILD TURKEY The bill (S. 2270) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase refuge lands within the State of South Carolina for the perpetuation of the eastern wild turkey and to provide pure-blood brood stock for restocking within its native range, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I wish to make a few brief remarks about this bill.

The Bureau of Biological Survey has discovered in my State the original breed of wild turkeys. The Bureau prepared a bill, and I introduced it. We have destroyed the passenger pigeons, we exterminated the bison, and now we are on the eve of exterminating the pure original wild turkey, which was indigenous to this country when it was discovered. Only $50,000 is asked to permit the Biological Survey to obtain control of certain property and protect the birds. Every lover of sport believes in perpetuating our food game stock and fish.

I shall not insist upon consideration of the bill at the present time, but I hope it may be taken up later and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

DELEGATION OF CERTAIN AUTHORITY, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 188) authorizing the delegation of certain authority within the Department of Agriculture was announced as next in order.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Thomas]. As I understand, the bill provides that some finance officer in the Department of Agriculture shall have the right, on his own signature, to allocate money to the disbursing officers. wish to inquire whether or not the finance officer who would be given this vast authority is subject to confirmation by the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. No.

Mr. ADAMS. Does not the Senator think an officer with such powers ought to be subject to confirmation by the Senate?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The reason for this bill is the fact that the Agricultural Department has been so expanded that the original officers who had certain powers conferred on them to act cannot do the work now incumbent upon the Department. In order to accomplish the end desired, it has been found necessary to divide the work and to expand the authority. This bill is for that specific purpose.

Mr. ADAMS. I am entirely in accord with that. My only inquiry is whether or not the individual to whom this authority is given ought not to be appointed subject to the confirmation of the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I think the Senator is absolutely correct. As to the salary of this particular official, I am not advised, and the salary would dictate, I think, whether or not the position should be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. ADAMS. If he is an officer of the class which is not subject to confirmation, the question is, Should he be given the authority in view of the fact that a billion and a quarter dollars will be subject to his disposition?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I think the Senator is entirely correct. The joint resolution may go over, and if an amendment is necessary to accomplish the purpose suggested, as the Senator who reported the joint resolution, I shall be very glad to accept such an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

DEFINITION OF STATUS OF UNDER SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

ACQUISITION OF COLLECTIONS BY GEOLOGICAL SURVEY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1542) to authorize the Director of the Geological Survey, under the general supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, to acquire certain collections for the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, this bill was introduced by me, and I should like to have it passed. It merely proposes to authorize the Geological Survey to accept gifts and devises of technical and other books, charts, maps, and so forth, for the United States for inclusion in the Geological Survey Library. The Survey's library is one of the world's finest and largest technical and scientific collections of books and maps covering the subject of geology, mineralogy, and metals, mapping, engineering, and related subjects.

The Geological Survey, in my opinion, is one of the most valuable agencies in the entire Government. I have been using the information provided by the Geological Survey for more than 35 years, and I think that any assistance that can be given to the Survey in its work should be provided. I assure Members of the Senate that great public service will be done by the passage of this bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have no objection to the bill. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Director of the Geological Survey, under the general supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized to acquire for the United States, by gift or devise, scientific or technical books, manuscripts, maps, and related materials, and to deposit the same in the library of the Geological Survey for reference and use as authorized by law.

ADDITIONAL LOCKS FOR PANAMA CANAL

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, during the absence of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Clark] I asked unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which Calendar No. 487, Senate bill 2229, was passed. I did not realize that the Senator from Missouri had temporarily left the Chamber. Noting that he has now returned, I renew my unanimous-consent request.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, of course, I have no objection to reconsidering action on the bill to which the Senator refers, but if it is reconsidered, I wish to give notice that so soon as I can obtain recognition, at the conclusion of the call of the calendar, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest that the Senator from Connecticut has asked for an explanation. The Senator from Missouri might obviate the necessity of the action suggested by him if he would now make an explanation of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will be very glad to explain the bill.

This measure is a very important and vital part of the national defense program, recommended by the President at the beginning of the session. It provides for the construction of an additional set of locks in the Panama Canal. The fact that it would at some time in the comparatively near future surely be necessary from a commercial standpoint as well as a national-defense standpoint to construct an additional set of locks in the Panama Canal has lobe been recognized. The Government has made a number of surveys. The latest report on the subject is embodied in a report of the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone, sent forward by the Secretary of War and embodied in House Document 210, at the present session of the Congress.

It has been recognized, Mr. President, as I have said for a long time, that by the year 1950 it will almost inevitably be necessary to construct an additional set of locks from the standpoint of the mere commercial usage of the canal. It is believed by the War Department and the Navy Department that it is extremely desirable to construct an additional set of locks perhaps 10 years in advance of the time when it would otherwise normally be necessary as a measure of national defense.

It is perfectly obvious from the statement of fact recognized by everyone that the Panama Canal, of course, is a vital artery of our naval defense. The two sets of locks now in existence in the Panama Canal are immediately adjacent to each other, and any damage which might come to one set of those locks by reason of sabotage or an air attack, would, in all likelihood, destroy both sets of locks and render the operation of the canal impossible for a certain length of time.

It is proposed to construct a new set of locks at a distance of possibly 5 or 6 miles, on the basis of surveys already made, which for the next few years at least could be used exclusively for naval vessels and Government vessels, to reduce to the very minimum any danger of sabotage in the Canal. While the new set of locks is not presently necessary from a strictly commercial standpoint, nevertheless it represents a sound investment from a commercial standpoint, and is believed by the War Department and the Navy Department to be vitally necessary to the national defense.

The House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries held very elaborate hearings upon this bill and the other bills dealing with other canals which had been submitted to it. In view of the extensive hearings which the House had held, and which were available to us, the Senate committee did not feel that it was necessary to hold extensive hearings. We did, however, hold hearings, at which appeared the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar], who is the author of a bill for the construction of a Nicaraguan canal, to which the Senate committee gave consideration. It was the opinion of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, however, that the proposal for additional facilities at Panama and the proposal for the construction of a Nicaraguan canal are not necessarily antagonistic; that irrespective of whether it may be necessary or desirable at some later time to construct a Nicaraguan canal, as a matter of national defense and as a matter of protection of the investment which we already have at Panama, a third set of locks at the Panama Canal should be constructed.

I may say in addition that the Nicaraguan canal would, at the minimum calculations, cost a billion and a quarter dollars—in all probability would cost very much more—and would entail an additional expense for its defense estimated at not less than $200,000,000 a year. In addition to that, of course, every bit of the traffic going through the Nicaraguan canal would be a subtraction from the revenue of the Panama Canal, which is now paying its own way; and there is the additional consideration that the new set of locks will eventually pay for themselves in the tolls of commercial vessels passing through the Canal. It is simply a question of authorizing at this time a construction which in any event will be necessary within the next very few years.

Mr. DANAHER and Mr. ANDREWS addressed the Chair. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield first to the Senator from Connecticut. Then I will yield to the Senator from Florida. Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his courtesy and for his very complete explanation.

As I understand the parliamentary situation, by unanimous consent we made bills on the calendar the order of business only today. I have not personally had an opportunity to examine either the bill or the report. There are phases of this matter which seem to me of sufficient importance that we ought to let it go over until Wednesday; and I ask the consent of the Senator from Missouri to that end.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is not a matter for me to determine. The majority leader stated to me that at the conclusion of the calendar, if an objection should be made on the call of the calendar, he would arrange to have me recognized so that I might move to take up the bill. In a case of that sort, of course, I feel obligated to take it up whenever the opportunity is afforded the committee.

I have no desire to delay the matter. The report has been in for several days. The subject has also been before the Committee on Military Affairs. As I say, there have been very full, adequate, and complete hearings in the House; and in view of the very urgent recommendations of the War Department and the Navy Department, it seems to me the bill should be forwarded as soon as possible.

If the Senator's request meets with the approval of the majority leader, I have no objection. I do not know what the plans for Wednesday are.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in arranging the program I had hoped that this bill could be passed on the call of the calendar. I suggested to the Senator from Missouri that if the bill should not be passed on the call of the calendar it be made the next order of business, and that he move to take it up, which he has planned to do.

On Wednesday we are scheduled to take up the Philippine bill, in charge of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Tydings], which probably will arouse some controversy; and it is important that this bill be passed at the very earliest date. I have no desire, and I am sure the Senator from Missouri has no desire, to rush the bill through over the objection of any Senator who wants it considered. It is the next legislative measure on the program, whether on this call or by motion. Whatever the Senator from Missouri wants to do about the matter will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. The reason for directing my inquiry to the Senator from Missouri in that form was that, as I interpreted the Senator's action, he had opposed my unanimous-

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I make no objection. The Senator means his request for reconsideration?

Mr. DANAHER. For reconsideration.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I stated that I should make no objection to reconsideration, but that under the statement which had been made to me by the majority leader I should move that the Senate proceed to consider the bill at the conclusion of the call of the calendar.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President-

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that the bill be made the unfinished business at the conclusion of the call of the calendar. I have no disposition to press it for consideration today.

Mr. DANAHER. That is quite agreeable; and I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

Mr. BARKLEY. While I am on the subject, then, I ask unanimous consent that, following the conclusion of the call of the calendar, Senate bill 2229 be made the unfinished

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. It is understood, of course, that under the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into the memorial services will begin at 2 o'clock today.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true. We shall suspend all legislative business at 2 o'clock, and at the conclusion of the memorial services I plan to move that the Senate adjourn until Wednesday; so the bill would not come up until Wednesday, although made the unfinished business today,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

REDUCTION OF DOWN-PAYMENT FOR NONSUBSIDIZED VESSEL CONSTRUCTION

The bill (H. R. 5756) to amend section 509 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 509 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended (52 Stat. 959; U. S. C. 1934 ed., Supp. IV, title 46, sec. 1159), is amended as follows:

(1) By amending the second sentence thereof to read as follows:

"If such application is approved by the Commission, the vessel may be constructed under the terms and conditions of this title, but no construction-differential subsidy shall be allowed."; and (2) By amending so much of the fourth sentence thereof as precedes the first semicolon therein to read as follows: "In case the vessel cedes the first semicolon therein to read as follows: "In case the vessel is designed to be of not less than 3,500 gross tons and to be capable of a sustained speed of not less than 14 knots, the applicant shall be required to pay the Commission not less than 12½ percent of the cost of such vessel, and in the case of any other vessel the applicant shall be required to pay the Commission not less than 25 percent of the cost of such vessel (excluding from such cost, in either case, the cost of national-defense features);".

CANCELATION OF SALVAGE CHARGES FOLLOWING HURRICANE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 485) providing for the cancelation of certain charges under section 20 of the River and Harbor Act of March 3, 1899, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, after the word "raising", to strike out "their boats after the hurricane of September 21, 1933" and insert "moving, or otherwise conducting salvage operations with respect to their vessels, boats, watercraft, or rafts after the hurricane of September 21, 1938: Browning Walls & Co., Inc., New York, N. Y.; McKinnon Construction Co., East Providence, R. I.; Providence Tow & Steamboat Co., Providence, R. I.; Jacob A. Hunt, East Providence, R. I.", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to cancel all amounts charged under section 20 of the River and Harbor Act of March 3, 1899, against the following persons as a result of the action taken by the United States Engineer Office in raising, moving, or otherwise conducting salvage operations with respect to their vessels, boats, watercraft, or rafts operations with respect to their vessels, boats, watercraft, or rafts after the hurricane of September 21, 1938; Browning Walls Co., Inc., New York, N. Y.; McKinnon Construction Co., East Providence, R. I.; Providence Tow & Steamboat Co., Providence, R. I.; Jacob A. Hunt, East Providence, R. I.; G. Blunt White, Mystic, Conn.; Harry Tatro, Mystic, Conn.; Walter Buddington, Noank, Conn.; Harry Douglas, Noank, Conn.; Post Shipyard, Mystic, Conn.; B. C. Chesebrough, Stonington, Conn.; William H. McLaughlin, North Stonington, Conn.; Francis DeBragga, Stonington, Conn.; and George Grogan, Stonington, Conn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let us have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, under existing law the Secretary of War is compelled to charge to shipowners the cost of salvage operations. During the recent hurricane which struck New England so seriously a large number of small fishing vessels and a few other craft were sunk or broken from their moorings. Under the direction of the Army engineers these boats were raised and recaptured. For the most part they are owned, as I have said, by the operators of small fishing boats. There are one or two other business craft, and, I think, one pleasure craft—I am not sure. The total amount of money involved is not in excess of $10,000.

If the owners were compelled to make payment for these salvage operations, it would be a very serious handicap, and I have some doubt that some of the men could recover their vessels under those circumstances. Because the matter arose from the hurricane, and because relief was afforded by the Government to all other persons who suffered in the hurricane in New England, as elsewhere, I am hopeful that there will be no objection to the bill. The Bureau of the Budget and the Secretary of War offer no opposition, and, I believe, look with favor upon the passage of the bill.

Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am sorry to trouble the Senator from Connecticut, but what is the reason for exonerating the insurance company from the payment of this obligation? I have not had time to read the report.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, the individual involved was ordered deported because of a charge that he had committed a felony. A bond in the amount of $500, furnished by an insurance company, was posted. Subsequent to the posting of the bond, the felony charged against the individual involved was dropped. It is my understanding that he was found innocent of the charges, and that automatically delayed the deportation proceedings, or set them aside. In the meantime the $500 involved had been turned over to the Treasury, and there was no way of making repayment. If the money had not been in the Treasury, it would have been automatically repaid, as is pointed out in the report.

Mr. KING. Having been acquitted, the individual was not finally deported, then?

Mr. MALONEY. He was not.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over. COOPERATION BETWEEN AMERICAN REPUBLICS

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, by order of the Chair, Calendar No. 524, Senate bill 2330, authorizing cooperation between the United States and other American republics, went to the bottom of the calendar. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin] asked for an explanation of the measure.

Mr. President, the bill is an authorization measure. It authorizes appropriation of about $800,000 to carry out the agreements and understandings of the United States Government under the conventions into which we entered with 21 American republics at Buenos Aires and Lima. The undertakings contemplate the exchange of professors, the exchange of students, and the supplying of expert information with regard to road building and bridge building, and other matters of that kind.

It is intended to carry out the treaties we have entered into, and which have been ratified by the Senate. I may state that no money is to be turned over to any foreign state whatever, but the expenditure is entirely within the discretion of our Government in carryng out the terms of the agreement as we see them.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I do not happen to be a member of the distinguished committee presided over by the Senator from Nevada, which has probably considered the bill. Did the Committee on Foreign Relations consider the bill?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes, we considered it twice; and at the last meeting, on Wednesday of this week, we had before us the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Messersmith, who explained the entire matter satisfactorily.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am satisfied with the explanation. I knew nothing about the measure previously.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if the Senator from Vermont will permit, I can verify the statement of the Senator from Nevada. There were several suspicions attached to the bill, all of which I think have been, let us say, substantially removed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2330) to authorize cooperation with other American republics in accordance with treaties, resolutions, declarations, and recommendations by all of the 21 American republics at the Inter-American Conference for the Maintenance of Peace, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to render closer and more effective the relationship between the American republics, the President of the United States is hereby authorized, subject to such appropriations as are made available for the purpose, to utilize the services of the departments, agencies, and independent establishments of the Government in carrying out the reciprocal undertakings and cooperative purposes enunciated in the treaties, resolutions, declarations, and recommendations signed by all of the 21 American republics at the Inter-American Conference for the Maintenance of Peace held at Buenos Aires, Argentina, in 1936, and at the Eighth International Conference of American States held at Lima, Peru, in 1938.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Thomas of Oklahoma in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5269) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. RUSSELL. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. Russell, Mr. Hayden, Mr. Tydings, Mr. Bank-Head, Mr. Smith, Mr. Nye, and Mr. McNary conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXTENSION OF PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE FACILITIES TO FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICERS

Mr. PITTMAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. Pittman, Mr. George, and Mr. Borah conferees on the part of the Senate.

ADDITIONAL LOCKS FOR PANAMA CANAL

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the order previously entered, the consideration of the calendar having been concluded, the Chair lays before the Senate the bill S. 2229, the Panama Canal Zone bill.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2229) authorizing and providing for the construction of additional facilities on the Canal Zone for the purposes of more adequately providing for the defense of the Panama Canal and for increasing its capacity for the future needs of interoceanic shipping.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the consideration of routine matters, with the understanding that it will remain as the unfinished business when the Senate reassembles on Wednesday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AID FOR PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED CHILDREN

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I wish to propound a parliamentary inquiry regarding the making of a motion. If the parliamentary situation permits, I should like to make a motion at this time that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 225, Senate bill 795, a bill which has been on the calendar practically the whole session this year and last, dealing with Federal aid for physically handicapped children. I am sure that it will take but a few minutes to dispose of the bill if we can get opportunity for the Senate to consider it. So I ask the question, Is the unfinished business the Panama Canal locks bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is the unfinished business.
Mr. PEPPER. I note that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Clark] is not on the floor at the present time——

Mr. BARKLEY. The Panama Canal lock bill was made the unfinished business with the understanding that it should go over until Wednesday. At 2 o'clock today the Senate enters upon a special order.

Mr. PEPPER. I realize that.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is my purpose to move an adjournment to Wednesday at the conclusion of the services this afternoon, so that the Senate will not be in session tomorrow. Personally I have no objection to the consideration of the Senator's bill, but I do not know whether it could be concluded by 2 o'clock; and if it were not concluded by that hour, of course it could not interfere with the unfinished business on Wednesday.

I think it will take but a few minutes to dispose of the canal bill on Wednesday, and then the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Tydings] desires to have the Philippine bill considered. Following that I had intended, as I stated to the Senator a few days ago, to arrange for him to be recognized so as to have his bill considered. I doubt whether we could conclude consideration of the Senator's bill by 2 o'clock today, although I do not know. There may be some question about it.

Mr. KING. Consideration of the measure could not be concluded by that time.

Mr. BARKLEY. If it were certain that the consideration of the measure could be concluded by that time, I would have no objection to taking it up now.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I could not hear all that was said on the other side of the Chamber during the present discussion, but I am sure I express the minority point of view when I say that when we know our time is so limited we ought not to take up for consideration so important a principle as is involved in the bill referred to.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the Senator from Florida probably should let his bill go over.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I gladly defer to the suggestion of the minority leader. However, I give notice that at the time suggested by the majority leader—that is, after the consideration of the Tydings Philippine bill shall have been concluded on Wednesday—I shall move that my bill be considered.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the Senator from Florida and all other Senators understand that that is subject to the prior right of any appropriation bill which may be ready for action.

Mr. PEPPER. That is understood.

AGREEMENT FOR RECESS UNTIL 1:55 P. M.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Utah [Mr. King] the Senate stand in recess until 5 minutes to 2.

LXXXIV-397

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

WAGES AND HOURS

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a short time. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. George] earlier in the day referred to the wage and hour law and to the serious consequences which had attended its execution in the South. He pointed to the fact that the efforts to standardize wages throughout the United States had most seriously affected industries of the South, and had accentuated unfavorable conditions which had been brought about by various factors.

I was reminded, when he was speaking, of the disastrous effects of this law upon the social, industrial, and economic life of the people of Puerto Rico. I have visited Puerto Rico upon a number of occasions, as a member of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, and am reasonably familiar with the economic conditions there prevailing. In my opinion, conditions in Puerto Rico are far from satisfactory; and this unsatisfactory situation is in part due to unwise policies and unwise legislation which has been made applicable to Puerto Rico.

It is obvious that, in a country so large as the United States, with its varying climatic and other conditions, a rigid and inflexible wage law cannot result other than in serious injury to various sections of our country; and that is particularly true when it is determined to enforce the same standards in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands as are applied in the industrial sections of the United States.

As Senators know, Puerto Rico has a population of at least 1,800,000. It is a very small island. Its resources are limited. Sugar and tobacco are the principal products of the island.

The tobacco business has been seriously injured by the wage and hour law and other policies of the National Government. As a matter of fact, the important factor in the tobacco industry is found in the "stripping" of the tobacco plants. The wage and hour law has seriously injured this activity and has thrown out of employment several thousand employees.

A number of years ago there were factories in Puerto Rico which manufactured cigars and prepared tobacco for the market. As stated, the tobacco industry is now seriously injured.

The sugar industry is the most important industry in the island; and second in importance is what is known as the "needlework" industry. Recently an economic convention was held in Puerto Rico, at which a number of resolutions were adopted, dealing with the deplorable economic and industrial situation. In one of the resolutions it is declared that the needlework industry takes second place as a source of employment in the island, and employs more than 50 percent of all workers employed in manufacture. The resolution states that the pay roll of the needlework industry is greater than that of any other manufacturing or agricultural industry, except that of sugar. The statement is further made that the annual net income accruing from the needlework industry was sufficient to pay for 40 percent of all foodstuffs imported into the island from the United States.

The resolution further declares that the needlework industry enables the island to purchase in the continental markets a large proportion of the needs of the people. It further states that the needlework industry cannot pay the wages fixed by the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, and that this will result in forcing the industry to shut down, which would be a calamity rendering still more acute the desperate economic situation at present affecting our—their—workers and the island in general.

My information is that 90,000 women were engaged in the needlework industry. Most of them carried on their work in their own homes. Senators know of the climatic conditions in Puerto Rico, and know that the duties of the housewife do not engage her entire time. As a result, she is permitted to engage in light work, such as needlework in connection with her home duties. My information is that the great majority of the women needleworkers carry on their work in their own homes. Perhaps 30 or 40 percent of those engaged in the needlework industry were employed in small factories. My information is that the wage and hour law has closed most of the factories and has seriously affected the employment in the homes, and that approximately 60,000 of the needleworkers are thrown out of employment.

The income which the needleworkers received before the wage and hour bill was passed was approximately $20,000,-000 per annum. As a result of the wage and hour bill and the consequent unemployment, this important factor in the economy of the people is menaced, and within a short time it is believed that the greater part of the $20,000,000 paid to the workers will be lost to the island and to its inhabitants. This will further demoralize conditions in the island, and it is quite certain, unless something is done to avert the disaster, it will place at least 300,000 people of the island upon relief.

The women of the island, engaged in needlework, had attained a high degree of efficiency and their products found a ready market in the United States. As a result of the wage and hour bill, throwing out of employment tens of thousands of women, the market for their products in the United States was largely lost to them and transferred to China, Japan, and other countries.

Mr. President, we are doing a great wrong to the people of Puerto Rico, and it seems to me most absurd to force upon them policies and measures which they do not want and which seriously, indeed, disastrously, affect their social and economic life. I have received many letters from residents of Puerto Rico protesting against the treatment accorded the island and its inhabitants, and particularly against the application of the wage and hour law to Puerto Rico.

I have taken this opportunity of inviting the attention of the Senate to the situation in Puerto Rico in order that steps may be taken by the executive department or Congress to alleviate conditions and to prevent what is obviously inevitable under the present system—a catastrophe affecting social and, indeed, political conditions in the island.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, as in executive session, laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, submitting sundry nominations in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RECESS TO 1:55 P. M.

Mr. KING. Under the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into, I move that the Senate take a recess until 5 minutes to 2 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 42 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until 1 o'clock and 55 minutes p.m., at which time it reassembled, and the President protempore took the chair.

MEMORIAL SERVICES FOR THE LATE SENATORS COPELAND AND LEWIS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 2 o'clock p. m.). Under a special order entered heretofore, this hour is set aside for memorial exercises for the late Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND, of New York, and the late Senator James Hamilton Lewis, of

The Chaplain will open the proceedings with prayer.

The Chaplain (Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D.) offered the following prayer:

Lord, Thou hast been our refuge: from one generation to another

Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever the earth and the world were made: Thou art God from everlasting, and world without end.

Thou turnest man to destruction: again Thou sayest, Come again, ye children of men.

For a thousand years in Thy sight are but as yesterday: seeing that is past as a watch in the night.

As soon as Thou scatterest them, they are even as a sleep:

and fade away suddenly like the grass. In the morning it is green, and groweth up: but in the evening it is cut down, dried up, and withered. For we consume away in Thy displeasure: and are afraid at Thy wrathful indignation.

Thou has set our misdeeds before Thee: and our secret sins in the light of Thy countenance.

For when Thou art angry all our days are gone: we bring our years to an end, as it were a tale that is told.

The days of our age are three score years and ten; and though men be so strong, that they come to four score years; yet is their strength then but labour and sorrow; so soon passeth it away, and we are gone.

O teach us to number our days: that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.

Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost. As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen.

Remember Thy servants, O Lord, according to the favor which Thou bearest unto Thy people, and grant that, increasing in knowledge and love of Thee, they may go from strength to strength, in the life of perfect service, in Thy heavenly kingdom; through Jesus Christ our Lord, who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Ghost ever, one God, world without end. Amen.

> Shapeless and grim A Shadow dim O'erhung the ways. And darkened all my days. And all who saw, With bated breath. Said, "It is Death."

And I in weakness Slipping towards the night, In sore affright Looked up. And lo!-No spectre grim, But just a dim Sweet face, A sweet high mother-face, A face like Christ's own mother's face, Alert with tenderness And grace.

"Thou are not Death!" I cried:-For Life's supremest fantasy Had never thus envisaged Death to me;-"Thou art not Death, the End!" In accents winning, Came the answer,-"Friend," There is no Death! I am the Beginning. "Not the End!"

And may the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, keep your hearts and minds in the knowledge and love of God and of His Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord; and may the blessing of God Almighty, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, be upon you and all who are near and dear unto you, both here and yonder, and remain with them and with you forever. Amen.

TRIBUTES TO THE MEMORY OF THE LATE SENATOR COPELAND

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 138), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND, late a Senator from the State of New York.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senator the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay tribute to his high character and distinguished public service.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In accordance with parliamentary practice, the resolution will be acted on after the addresses shall have been delivered.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the year which has gone by since the death of my late colleague, ROYAL S. COPELAND, has not numbed our sorrow at his passing nor dulled our appreciation of his exemplary merits. In his death the Nation has lost one of its most illustrious citizens, the State of New York has lost a faithful servant, and I feel a personal bereavement in the loss of a close friend.

As we travel down the broad highway of life, there is given to each of us, in varying degree, some opportunity for service to our fellow men. Seldom has such opportunity been so richly bestowed or so fully utilized as in the life of ROYAL S. COPELAND. For to him was given the opportunity to perform high public service not only as a great Member of this body but also as a man of science.

With a life blending so beautifully two such ordinarily divergent professions as medicine and public service, he brought to the practical problems of government the high idealism of the oath of Hippocrates. His public life was characterized by the dispassionate analysis of the scientist and the warm human feeling of a physician. His goal was the cure of both the physical and the economic ills of society.

Born and raised in the Middle West, ROYAL S. COPELAND came to New York in 1908. His record of public service had already begun, for he had served as mayor of Ann Arbor, Mich., and as trustee of the Michigan State Tuberculosis Sanatorium. His assiduous studies of public-health problems and his other distinguished medical service soon attracted favorable attention and led to his appointment as a member of the New York City Ambulance Board and later as city health commissioner. In this important office he quickly demonstrated his unique administrative abilities to put medical science to work for the benefit of all the people. His many successful health campaigns brought countless benefits in human welfare. One of his campaigns, for example, resulted in doubling the consumption of milk by the people of New York.

In his rapid rise to eminence in public affairs the Nation soon shared with the State of New York in the fruits of his accomplishments. Four years after his appointment as health commissioner ROYAL S. COPELAND had won election to this body and entered upon a long and distinguished career on the stage of national affairs.

This body has never had a more conscientious, courageous, and capable Member. Whatever cause he espoused during his 16 years of service, he sustained with a sincerity of purpose and breadth of knowledge which commanded respect and admiration knowing no partisan bounds. The development of civil aeronautics and of the American merchant fleet were close to his heart, and to these tasks he devoted untold hours of unflagging labor to his dying day.

His profession naturally led him to take a special interest in the improvement of pure food and drug laws. Two days before his death he succeeded in obtaining their enactment after a 5-year fight, thus accomplishing what he himself considered his greatest senatorial victory.

In addition to these strenuous legislative labors, he continued to the end his writings in the daily press. No one can ever know the countless lives eased or saved through this medium. But if the warmth and affection with which he was regarded throughout the length and breadth of the Nation may be taken as a criterion, many an humble citizen acknowledged an indebtedness to Dr. Copeland for professional counsel, in terms of health and happiness, which can never be repaid.

Because of what he saw through his medical eyes, and because he rightly and generously assumed responsibility for the physical well-being of every Member of this body, my colleague frequently cautioned against the dangers of overwork during the hectic periods of a congressional session. On the sad day following the death of our late leader, the beloved Senator Joseph T. Robinson, Dr. COPELAND expressed the fervent hope that "out of this disaster may come a warning which will fend off other disasters."

But, ever the devoted public servant, he labored indefatigably in the face of his own warnings, and became a knowing martyr in the public cause. Two days before his death he left his sickbed to participate in nine separate and arduous conferences between Senate and House conferees relating to important and necessary legislation. Beyond a doubt his untimely death was brought on by these exhausting labors for the public weal.

As truly as the slain soldier deserves the homage of the Nation, the unselfish service of ROYAL S. COPELAND has earned him the everlasting gratitude of the American people and a permanent place high on the roll of those who gave to their country "the last full measure of devotion."

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, it is with a sense of keenest personal loss, to say nothing of the loss to the common weal, that I rise to add my humble words to the flowers of affection that are brought this reminiscent afternoon to the Senate of the United States in memory of a great citizen, a great partiot, a great humanitarian, a great statesman, and a great friend.

Senator Copeland came originally from my home State of Michigan, and he deeply loved the roots of his nativity. It was ever his State, and he was ever its third Senator. Indeed, he is part of our proudest Michigan tradition, even as he sprang from our blood and soil. Here he was born near a little village on the rugged countryside, which became a part of him. Here he labored in his youth and early maturity. Here he commenced the practice of medicine, in which he was to rise to the heights of a profession which ever remained his first love and in which he became the trusted confidant of thousands. Here he began his collegiate activities, at his beloved University of Michigan, which will ever honor him as one of its most distinguished sons. Here he first entered public life. He was the mayor of Ann Arbor when I was on the university campus much more than 30 years ago. From that hour until the moment of his untimely death we were firm friends. I knew him in the intimacies of those close contacts which are reserved by each of us for but a few. I knew him in the sweetness of his home relationships. I knew him later as a great Senator. But I knew him first and always as a man. Nothing finer ever lived. He was as rugged in the loyalties of his character as he was gentle in his consideration for others. He was as kindly as he was brave. He never deserted the faith that was in him. He lived and died a Christian patriot.

Michigan gave the world a great soul when ROYAL S. COPE-LAND was born. Michigan loaned him to the State of New York in the flower of his young manhood, and New York gave him to the Nation. You may follow his career from its humble beginnings on a Michigan farmstead to his thrice commissioned senatorship from the largest and richest State in the Union, and every inch of the way you will find a trail of honor, industry, service, friendliness, and achievement. It is needless for me to remind the Senate or the country of the brilliant part he played for many years in the legislative life of the Republic. He displayed an amazing versatility of interest. He completely mastered any subject to which he put his splendid mind. Indeed, the final entries on his Senate record tell this tale more eloquently than words. As the able senior Senator from New York has indicated, in the hard, hot days preceding the last congressional adjournment he was chairman simultaneously of nine different conference committees, representing House and Senate, charged with the responsibility of composing differences in respect to important legislation. It was an inhuman burden to put upon any man. But he who repeatedly warned the rest of us to take care and watch out lest we tax ourselves beyond endurance, he uncomplainingly taxed himself beyond endurance, and 24 hours after the curtain fell upon the Congress it fell upon his mortal career.

A notable patriotic organization in New York proposed for him this epitaph: "He died at work." Indeed he did. But I would add one illuminating phrase: "He died, as he had lived, at work for his fellow men."

I never knew any practical legislative proposal to lack his vigorous support if it sought to serve the welfare of the unfortunate, the lowly, or the underprivileged. He believed in social justice; and he practiced what he preached. I never knew any assault upon what he believed to be the integrity of constitutional government that did not find him in the flaming armor of a crusading knight for the preservation of our free institutions. More than once I saw him under acid test, but I never knew him to desert a principle when once an issue came to grips with what he believed to be the destiny of constitutional democracy. In such circumstances he was always first to accept the challenge; and, having enlisted in a cause, he never knew the meaning of truce or of surrender.

Others have spoken and will speak this day of the details of his vivid record. I did so on my own account in the opening hours of this session. But none of us can add anything to what he has written for himself in the devoted respect and the long, lingering affections of his fellow countrymen. I can say only that I miss him-deeply miss himeach day that I look for him in vain across yonder aisle, where I now see the red carnation for the last time. He was so virile, so dynamic, that one thought of him as always living on and on. But inevitably the great accounting comes for all of us. Fortunate, indeed, are we if we may approach the judgment seat with so complete and so deserved an assurance of the eternal benediction which must have greeted him with the finality of all rewards:

Well done, thou good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I entered the Senate a short time before Senator Copeland entered this body. We were desk mates on the back row on this side of the aisle. Later, we were desk mates on an intermediate row. Finally, we both came down to the front row, and he remained my desk mate until the end.

Thinking of him today, I cannot but recall his last utterance in this body. Already the pallor of death was upon his face. He had grown weak with the weary work of a session ending in June. He had been on his feet many times to further or to complete legislation in which he had great interest. On the last day that he occupied a seat in this body, when he rose to make for his last time some observations upon a pending measure, I asked him not to speak. He assured me that he would say only a few words. Some one called me away from my seat, and when I returned ROYAL S. COPELAND was going out of this body forever.

I think of him as a man, because I was thrown with him so intimately from the time he entered this body. He was a man with capacity for great friendship. He had a great capacity for kindliness. He was a man of infinite good humor, and of good feeling, and of good will. He was patient, kindly, and gentle. He had those rare qualities which enabled him to impress all of his fellow men with whom he came in close contact with his complete friendship for them.

He was a great church man. He loved his church. Although he possessed that broad catholicity of spirit with which men are rarely endowed, or blessed, he had not the slightest antipathy or animosity toward any race or any creed. Yet he loved his own church, even as he loved the little town of Dexter, in the great Midwestern State of the distinguished Senator who has just spoken here, with a personal, passionate kind of love.

He had an intense interest in all civic, educational, and religious matters, as well as in political questions.

Mr. President, thinking back over the days, I found ROYAL S. COPELAND when he came into this body intensely interested in general welfare legislation, in public health. He was interested in everything which had to do with the poor, and the weak, and the helpless. His sympathy for these was true and genuine.

He was interested much in human welfare legislation. That had been the background of his experience as a physician, as a teacher, as the health commissioner of the great city of New York, in the Empire State of the Nation. He drew upon his experience. But I saw him broaden, almost perceptibly broaden, his interest in the whole field of human legislation and human relationships.

As all of our colleagues will recall, he became perhaps the best-versed and best-informed man on maritime law in this body. He had a great passion to rebuild and to fortify and to strengthen our merchant marine.

We all know with what intense industry Senator Copeland applied himself to everything which came within his care. We all must recall how, for the 5 long years to which the distinguished senior Senator from New York has already referred, he made his fight for the present Pure Food and Drug Acts.

Mr. President, Senator Copeland's interest broadened after he entered this body, it constantly broadened. Not only did he leave his impress upon much of the useful legislation which passed this body and the Congress of the United States during the years since he entered upon his public service as Senator, but his own affections broadened. He was a genuine American. He did not pay lip service merely to the American system of government: He understood it; he had an inherited understanding of it which came down from the days when the Pilgrims landed on our shores. Indeed, he traced his ancestry back through those Pilgrims to the sturdy Irish and English of the old country.

Senator COPELAND appreciated the American system of Government, and with that same kindliness and with that same great industry with which he approached all of his public duties, he never failed to register his deepest conviction upon those measures which have more significance than the passing matters which come before this body.

He had courage, and that is the rarest quality of the public official today, not only in this country, but in the world. He had a courage which could not be stilled or hushed by flattery, by threat, by intimidation.

As his deskmate since the day he entered the Senate I unhesitatingly declare, and in the declaration pay to him the highest compliment which can be paid to any statesman, that none of his colleagues had to await the roll call to know where ROYAL S. COPELAND stood upon any matter of great and first importance.

Mr. President, I well remember a notable fight, now ended, in which many of us in the Senate were arrayed upon the one side and many of our colleagues upon the other, an issue upon which honest and well-informed and conscientious and patriotic men differed, and I well remember the conclusion of the fight. A little group of Senators, personal friends of Royal Copeland, met with him, as we had been accustomed to meet through the long weary months when that issue was before the Senate and the country, and we all knew that that evening the fight was over. As the little group dispersed, Senator Copeland turned to me and said,

"It has been worth this fight. We have had our small part in the saving of this country."

Senator Copeland was a man of great courage, of high courage, and as I watched his broadening interest in legislation, countless laws and bills, from the beginning of his career to the end, I think I can pay to him no higher compliment than I have already paid him in declaring him not only an industrious and useful Senator, whose name is attached to many worth-while laws, but a man of rare courage, who, without dramatics, nevertheless went steadily on to the end.

Those of us who went with him to his last resting place in the countryside of the great Empire State well remember the good minister, who took for his text that verse from Paul's second letter to Timothy:

I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith.

His bereaved friends in this body know that his course is finished, as his friends all over the Nation know and understand. That he fought a good fight all of us here are free to attest. That he kept the faith, faith with the American people, faith with his highest concepts of duty to the American system of government, as a Member of the Congress of the United States, with a seat in the Senate, those of who knew him well may with great confidence assert.

With that passionate love which he bore for the little town of his birth, and always for the friends and associates of his boyhood, and with that passionate affection in which he held his friends in this body and his friends everywhere, we can say that we loved ROYAL S. COPELAND, and that in his way he was a good and a faithful servant, and that down to the last hour he had the high courage to keep the faith that was within him.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, one who comes to this body as a total stranger will as time goes on naturally remember those who first took him by the hand. I came as a total stranger from the far West to the city of Washington and, indeed, to this body. I recall the first Member of the Senate who took me by the hand to lead me along right lines when faith and justice and my country's welfare were involved.

You may break, you may shatter the vase if you will, But the scent of the roses will hang 'round it still.

And so today one who has pased through only his first term in this body brings back the scent of the roses, the memory of the friendship extended by one who had a clever understanding of the affairs of this most exalted group, that the newcomer might go forward and know what it was all about.

But, Mr. President, as time went on and as acquaintance became closer, I learned more intimately to know the depth of a great character; I learned more intimately to rely upon a truth that was the soul's center, upon a faith that was as broad as the country, upon a patriotism that will return with the reverberations of eternity.

I may—I hope with propriety—recall the lines of a great American who said:

Christ gave us proof of immortality. Yet it would hardly seem necessary for one to rise from the dead to convince us that the grave is not the end.

Mr. President, with memories of a patriotism such as that handed down to this body and to America by Royal S. Copeland comes added conviction that the grave is not the end. The glory of his country, everlasting and eternal, unending, as we hope it will be, the glory of American citizenship is, and I hope will always continue to be, associated with the name of Royal S. Copeland.

As the red comes from the flower he so loved, so the red memory of America will enshrine his name, because he gave his strength to a cause that has come down in history and will go down in history.

Realizing his own physical weakness, he warned his fellows—yea, he sent the word of warning to the great leader of his party during that Congress which closed not so long ago—when he said, "There are men here who should have caution." While he was saying that, his one idea of caution was to remain on the floor of the Senate until the Constitution of the United States, as it had been enshrined in the hearts of millions of his countrymen, was safe. He would remain on the floor of the Senate until the land that he loved was secure. He would remain on the floor of the Senate although he warned his fellows of the dangers that surrounded them. He would remain here as he did remain here, as his memory will remain here, as one of those whose names stand behind American institutions and American tradition to give us courage that we in his memory shall carry on.

So I come back to the thought I first expressed:

You may break, you may shatter the vase if you will, But the scent of the roses will hang 'round it still.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, Senator Copeland had two wellknown personal characteristics-his unruly hair and the inevitable red carnation which he wore in the lapel of his coat. Both of these were tokens of his strong independent nature. Senator COPELAND was a native son of Michigan. He began his public career at the turn of the century as mayor of Ann Arbor. But even before that time he had been active in civic improvement, establishing a splendid reputation for fair play and a keen understanding of human nature.

In 1918 Mayor John F. Hylan appointed Dr. COPELAND health commissioner of New York City, a position which he retained until he was elected to the United States Senate in 1922. He was reelected in 1928 and again in 1934. He maintained an independent position in the Senate throughout, and cooperated with the various administrations insofar as his own personal convictions would permit. He participated in legislative developments covering a wide range of interests, as would be expected from any Senator representing the most populous State in the Union. He was especially active in promoting public-health measures, safety in air and on the sea, relief of white-collared workers, barring the illegal possession of firearms, and the prevention of crime through public-school instruction. At all times he evinced a fraternal interest in the personal health of all his colleagues and repeatedly warned them against neglect of health and overstrain. The last notable instance of this care of his associates was the warning he gave the late Senator Joseph T. Robinson, of Arkansas, while in the heat of debate, just prior to his death. Such was the devotion of Senator Copeland to duty that he himself was carried away and his days shortened by the indefatigable energy with which he applied himself to his public work. Never was there a man more intent upon discharging his full duty.

On June 27, 1938, I wrote to Dr. W. A. Pearson, dean of the Hahnemann Medical College and Hospital in Philadelphia as follows:

The passing of Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND should be commemorated in some practical way. Here was a statesman, whom I have long been happy to know as a personal friend and one who carried his vocational role as a physician into the Senate of the United States, thus bringing the services of this noble profession to the constant attention of the American people. Probably no other physician in the annals of American history has enjoyed such national distinction as Dr. Cofeland.

November 7 is his birthday, and I think it fitting that the work which Dr. Cofeland has so well begun should be continued through the years. I am, therefore, suggesting that his birthday be accepted in the United States as Health Day. On this day it would seem an occasion would be welcomed by millions of our citizens to express their personal appreciation of their doctors, dentists, and nurses, and indeed to all who have had a part in promoting their health and happiness. Appropriate greetings should keep Uncle Sam's mails busy on that day. Health Day should be observed in our schools and colleges. Moreover this would be an occasion for an annual review of advances made in medical science, together with suitable recognition for those who have achieved extraordinary distinction in the advancement of medical science. In addition, some way may be found whereby scholarships for needy and worthy medical students may be provided. Doubtless with the passing of time new ways to add to the glory and significance of Health Day will be found. I feel confident that the birthday of Dr. COPELAND, if remembered in this way, will prove to be a lasting blessing to the American

If this suggestion appeals to you and if you wish to cooperate in bringing it to the attention of the citizens of the Nation, I shall appreciate hearing from you as to the procedure you think best for the practical accomplishment of this purpose.

In reply, Dr. Pearson wrote me expressing his belief that this would be a splendid recognition of Dr. COPELAND's spirit and service, and sending me a copy of a recent article he had written about Dr. COPELAND that was published in the Hahnemannian Monthly. I wish to quote brief portions of Dr. Pearson's article:

It is difficult to depict the life of such an active man with accuracy. His versatile mind and conscientious study enabled him to accumulate an amazing amount of reliable information. * * *
His interest in the new food and drug legislation was unbounded and his detailed knowledge included technical chemical details, legislative procedures, interests of reputable manufacturers, and he never wavered from the policy of giving adequate protection to the public.

ROYAL SAMUEL COPELAND lived a life filled with hard work of definite constructive value. He helped millions of people with his suggestions on health, medicine, and the fine art of living which were the result of wide experience, ardent study, sympathy for the underdeveloped, and a sincere desire to make the world a better place in which to live.

Dr. COPELAND was actively identified all his life with the principles of political and religious toleration. He was a stalwart defender of good will among all men. He realized the worth of free ideas. The most democratic thing in the world is an idea. To be the cradle of a great thought is the deepest religious experience a man can have. A dominant idea will choose a humble birthplace for itself, often in the mind of some obscure man or some neglected child, and from that idea will grow the force of a mighty movement which will shake the world and rock the thrones of earthly rulers. Before the power of a great idea the forces of present-day dictators must tremble. They will give way before the shining light of truth as the blackness of midnight yields to the approach of the rising sun.

America needs strong men, such as Dr. ROYAL SAMUEL COPE-LAND, who put God first in their daily life. America needs strong men-many strong men-not just one or a few. America needs strong men who accept as the ideals of their lives the patterns of individual initiative and divine guidance which led our American sires as pioneers from ocean to ocean. No one has yet found a substitute for their strength of character and the stout hearts which they brought to the making of America. No sacrifice is too great which will help us conserve our American heritage of courage and faith.

These are the thoughts that come to me when I think of Dr. Copeland. Words fail me when I try to express how sad we all were in his passing. Dr. COPELAND and I had been scheduled to address a convention of doctors in Philadelphia, and he was unable to attend. His last words to me were, "I cannot go, Jim. I am too tired." So he had to cancel the engagement. As it turned out, I was also compelled to cancel my engagement, because the Senate was in session that day late into the evening.

> At even, ere the sun was set, The sick, O Lord, around Thee lay; Oh, in what divers pains they met! Oh, with what joy they went away!

Once more 'tis eventide, and we, Oppressed with various ills, draw near; What if Thy form we cannot see? We know and feel that Thou art here.

Thy touch has still its ancient power, No word from Thee can fruitless fall; Hear, in this solemn evening hour, And in Thy mercy heal us all.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, we have but to wander through the Halls of this great building to learn at first-hand in what respect and admiration Dr. COPELAND was held by those who served here during his senatorial career. It is amazing that such an extremely busy man could have had the time to enlist the friendship of so many Capitol employees, even down to those in the most humble capacities. In every nook and cranny of the Capitol are men and women who found him their friend, and who took a real delight in paying him even the smallest service. The universal comment throughout the Capitol usually resolves itself into five words: "He was a great man."

Dr. COPELAND was a beloved man among the great and the small because he was intensely human, kind, and generous.

While he and I served at opposite ends of the Capitol, I had many occasions to feel the strength of his friendship.

Members of the Senate know far better than I can hope to express the scope of his fairness and his kindness. He was a man who stood valiantly by his convictions—one who fought fairly in every debate. They know how indefatigably he labored and how unselfishly he served the causes he thought to be just.

As a devoted husband and father Dr. Copeland lived an exemplary home life, and found his deepest happiness with his family, surrounded by those he loved, those who so dearly loved him. He gained peace of mind and strength to carry on his many official duties through the companionship and the inspiration of his good wife and family. He thoroughly enjoyed his home, and liked to return to Suffern, in Rockland County, there to be among his intimate friends and neighbors. In the quiet restfulness of his farm he found a little time to relax, to cast aside his mental burdens, and to bask in the pleasantries that accompany a happy home. He found recreation in his garden, and he especially liked to engage himself in his workshop. He deeply loved the country and the out-of-doors. He sought no happier respite than to spend some time with his family, and to enjoy the beauties of the countryside about his home.

Serving in his stead. I have grown more deeply conscious of the services he rendered to the people of my State. He instinctively liked people. He liked to do things for people. He died working for his people—a martyr to detail and to duty. I find constant reflection of his many little kindly gestures, which certainly could have been inspired only by a heart that was warm and by a spirit that made public service a perpetual pleasure to him.

Dr. Copeland's career was studded with one paradox after another, with a wealth of human learning and experience, and with achievements in several fields of high endeavor. He was born on a farm in the State of Michigan; he died as a citizen of New York, the largest city in the world. Educated in medicine, he became an outstanding physician, a noted teacher, a renowned statesman. He began his political life in his native State of Michigan, where he was elected mayor of Ann Arbor. His career came to a close in this Chamber as a Senator from the Nation's Empire State. He was a pillar in his church, a college dean, a park commissioner, a board of education president, a mayor, a health commissioner, and a United States Senator. These varied activities gave him a broad range of training, and accounted for the depth of his fund of knowledge.

His ability, his perseverance, and his natural brilliance are attested to by his rise to fame in the profession of his choosing. He began practicing medicine in 1895 at Bay City, Mich., and by 1918 he had become a national figure in the medical world as he began his creditable record as commissioner of health of New York City. His political rise to distinction was just as phenomenal and was actuated by the same earnest effort which characterized his devotion to every task to which he applied himself.

Senator Copeland served powerfully in this body, and it is not for me even to try to record the extent of his legislative genius or the influence which he exerted in the passage of legislation to which he was particularly devoted.

The most important chapter in his legislative record was successfully written when his food and drug bill became law. He seized upon this subject because it was near to him and because he had a consuming ambition to protect by law the health of millions of persons from misbranded, falsely advertised, and at times injurious food and drug products. He labored over each and every section of that humanitarian law. He lent every ounce of his energy and enthusiasm to its He was directly and, in most respects, individually responsible for this statute which today serves humanity so beneficially. He rightfully considered this his greatest legislative victory, and without question it was his crowning achievement in the interests of humankind.

He served as chairman of the Committee on Rules, as chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and as chairman of several special Senate investigating committees, including the Special Committee to Investigate Crime Throughout the Nation, the Special Committee to Investigate Subversive Influences in the American Merchant Marine, and the Special Committee to Investigate the Causes of the Morro Castle and Mohawk Ship Disasters.

In the merchant marine field Senator COPELAND sponsored numerous laws beneficial to the seamen, and time and again he pleaded their cause before this body. He was the author of the Merchant Marine Act, which set up the present Maritime Commission; he lent powerful influence to aviation legislation, notably the law to set up the Civil Aeronautics Authority; he was a relentless foe of the criminal, and just last year successfully piloted the so-called firearms bill to enactment; he sponsored the Flood Control Act of national importance; and he endeared himself to the citizens of the District of Columbia by his annual efforts to promote improved civic, educational, health, and park facilities for the Nation's Capital.

I have touched but lightly upon his legislative accomplishments; but to the laborer, the farmer, the seaman, the veteran, and to many other groups he shall forever remain in memory a real and true friend. The advancement of their hopes and aspirations was always uppermost in his mind. He died serving them as a member of nine conference committees in the closing hours of a long and grueling session of Congress. He felt those duties to be obligations he must not shirk. The burdens proved too great for his tired and overtaxed body. His contributions as a lawmaker, like his services in the field of medicine, improved the living standards of the poor-they enriched the Republic he served so well.

Ordinary folk simply call ROYAL S. COPELAND a great man, and I presume no epitaph could express our thoughts more genuinely.

As such he shall always remain in our hearts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

The resolution (S. Res. 138) was unanimously agreed to.

TRIBUTES TO THE MEMORY OF THE LATE SENATOR LEWIS

Mr. LUCAS. I send to the desk a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read. The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 139), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. James Hamilton Lewis, late a Senator from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senator the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay tribute to his high character and distinguished

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President and Members of the Senate, it was only a few weeks ago that our late and beloved colleague. James Hamilton Lewis, marched down these Senate aisles in courtly fashion. It seems but yesterday that citizens in every walk of life came to this stately hall to hear his brilliant wit and profit by his penetrating scholarship.

He was beyond the middle plateau of life, and yet his years in no way dimmed his intellectual capacity. Age had not slowed the tempo of his active life when one day the Angel of Death moved swiftly into the Senate Chamber and, with little warning, took from our ranks this illustrious son of Illinois and the Nation.

Mr. President, little did I think when the people of my State last November selected me to join Senator Lewis that I would upon this day be called upon to pay tribute to his memory. It is with the utmost humility that I attempt the task. Obviously my years of friendship and close contacts with this great man lighten my load. Yet, my friends, words are so empty and cold when one attempts to describe the virtues and qualities of such a strong personality.

In the days that have intervened since his departure I have sought to analyze his life and determine the outstanding characteristics which made him such a unique figure in the public eye. The difficulty of the task is readily apparent. From a life rich in experience and a personality generously endowed with admirable traits it is hard to single out any one thing responsible for his greatness.

His life story is fantastic, for it seems incredible that any man could have accomplished so much even in the generous span of years allotted to him. All the romance and courage and spirit of the Nation he loved so zealously are symbolized in the annals of his career.

His Chesterfieldian courtesy awed and delighted those of us who served with him and those who knew him even slightly, as did the grace of manner, the gentility, and the enlightened intellectual outlook bequeathed to him by generations of culture.

Beneath the courtliness of his polished and suave exterior, however, a spirit of adventure coursed strongly in his veins. It was this impelling force which, in the last decade of the nineteenth century, led him from the South to the rugged Pacific Northwest. He arrived in the Territory of Washington in 1886. Those were pioneer days, and any young man who settled in the Territory could not depend upon his background nor on tradition to carry him to the top, because those who settled that area were making tradition, and the only background was the immediate present.

The same qualities which later were to carry him to national and international fame were responsible for his success in serving in the Territorial senate, in being elected to the Congress of the United States as the first Representative at Large from the State of Washington, in serving his country during the Spanish-American War, in being nominated to the United States Senate, and in being put forward as the favorite son of the State of Washington for the Vice Presidency at the Democratic National Convention of 1900 at Kansas City.

Thus in the short span of 15 years he had accumulated honors which, to many men, would constitute sufficient accomplishment for a lifetime. But for James Hamilton Lewis these signal achievements served only as an inspiration to greater things. That same adventuresome spirit which carried him to the great open spaces of the Pacific Northwest heard the hum of the wheels of industry and sent him, just after the turn of the century, to the great metropolitan center of Chicago.

Two years later he was corporation counsel of that city, 5 years after he arrived he was Democratic candidate for Governor of the State of Illinois, and 9 years after he became a resident of Chicago he was elected to the United States Senate. What greater testimonial to his ability and his versatility could be given than this rapid winning of the confidence of a diversified people of a great State wherein he had resided for so few years?

It would seem there were no new worlds to conquer, yet he followed these rare accomplishments with repeated triumphs in political, diplomatic, and military arenas. Then, in 1930, the people of Illinois again returned him to serve them in the Senate of the United States, and, by his reelection in 1936, he became the first man in Illinois to serve two successive terms as Senator after the origin of the direct primary.

His career in the great parliamentary body was filled with brilliant and constructive achievements. His suave urbanity and gentility of manner were ever at his side. His keen perception of human nature, his shrewd understanding of psychology, and his impeccable politeness sometimes caused his antagonists, and even his supporters, to lose sight of the steely strength, the fixity of purpose, and the daring which won for him so many objectives. Of no man could it more truly be said that even those who vied with him in debate or in political strategy felt naught but the highest admiration for his attainments. Every Member of the Senate knew Senator Lewis to be a scholar, statesman, patriot, soldier, and gentleman.

It has been said that genius does what it must; talent does what it can. Nature endowed James Hamilton Lewis generously with talents, and added a spark of genius. Mr. President, since the day our beloved Chaplain spoke so feelingly over the bier of our departed colleague, my thoughts have been focused upon this unusual combination. Talent inspired by genius may impel a man to scale the heights in various fields of human endeavor, but it must be tempered by the great sense of tolerance and justice which Senator Lewis possessed if a man is to hold the high position in the affairs of a nation which he retained for so many years.

His attitude toward his fellow man is best portrayed in a remark that was recently made to me by one who had been closely associated with him for years when he said, "In all the years I have known Senator Lewis, and all the years I have worked by his side, I never heard him speak an unkind word against a man in public or private life." To me that is an epitaph which could well be inscribed over his final resting place.

In quiet contemplation I have pondered over the implication of that remark, and it occurred to me that the fullness and the richness of his life gave a perspective and a sense of relative values often denied to others of us who might not have had the experiences which he enjoyed. When one sees as much and does as much as he did in his crowded years, the transient nature of the passing moment is best appreciated.

Tolerance implies understanding. Thus, this same quality was the one which enabled him to be so truly representative of the people of Illinois during his three terms in the United States Senate, as well as in other assignments of responsibility. A man who possesses tolerance is one who has rubbed elbows with the throng, and who, through that close contact with humanity, comes to understand the simple human problems which, magnified a millionfold, are converted into national, even international, issues.

The Senator's rich and varied experience served him well in the United States Senate. As a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, he exercised a potent influence on the role America has played in world affairs. He decried the despotism of those who, with the iron heel and mailed flst, stamp out the God-given rights of peoples. He was the bitter foe of oppression and tyranny wherever they raised their monstrous heads. Senator Lewis never condoned making countless thousands mourn through the display of force and power. He believed in the solution of the complicated problems of international import through peaceful discussion, reason, logic, sacrifice, and arbitration.

He had firm conviction upon all fundamental rights of peoples, yet Members of this body will bear witness to the unerring fact that in his speeches, debates, and in his dealing with his fellow men, Senator Lewis not only personified tolerance but inspired it in others. No matter how acrimonious the speech, no matter how heated the epithet hurled against him, no matter how much interested he may have been in the subject matter before him, he never lost sight of nor failed to sympathize with the point of view of his opponent. In other words, his tolerant attitude was a recognition of that inherent principle of democracy, respect the rights of others.

It was the great Voltaire who said, "I wholly disapprove of what you say, but will defend to the death your right to say it." James Hamilton Lewis was a disciple of that philosophy. Yes, Mr. President, if the tolerant attitude of this man toward all races and creeds and their inalienable rights could be instilled into the leaders of nations throughout the world, the universal cry for peace on earth and good will toward men would be transformed from a futile hope into a living reality.

Nothing that I have said here today can add to the luster of his fame or the glory of his career. His record has been written, and each of us would be proud to claim it for his own. His stature will grow with the passing of the years; and the historians of the future will best serve their generations by recording his life so that the principles of tolerance, faith, sympathy, and patriotism may provide inspiration for generations yet unborn.

Senator Lewis, we bid you a further and final farewell. Sleep well in your inn of immortality! And as the ages come to you, may these beautiful sentiments of Edwin Markham be with you forevermore:

Now in this hour, this high remembering hour, I see the eternal Lord of Song bend down With fragrant, fadeless laurels for your brow, Lay them with reverence on your honored head, And leave you in your immortality.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, as we observe by the elegant and eloquent address to which we have just listened, James Hamilton Lewis lives on. The immortal qualities of his character will develop from his mortal life, as a giant sequoia grows through the centuries from the tiny seed that perished in the ground.

What his colleagues here and now record of his loyalty to principle, to his country, to his family, to his fellow man, and, within these walls, to his colleagues, is but the recognition of his works.

Mr. President, I first met James Hamilton Lewis when I came to the Senate in 1931. Already he had long served his country as lawyer, soldier, Representative at Large from the State of Washington, and United States Senator from the State of Illinois.

His intellect had sought satisfaction and exercise in the exploration of history, especially the record of the development of governments and the relationship between governments.

In 1912 Senator Lewis, together with Albert H. Putney, another author of treatises on government and history and law, wrote the treatise entitled "Handbook on Election Laws."

In 1913, Senator Lewis wrote a book entitled "The Two Great Republics, Rome and the United States," comparing conditions recorded in Roman history with those existing in America, which, he said in his preface, "should warn, by reason of the results at Rome." Although written more than a quarter of a century ago, this book might have been written under conditions in this country today.

In 1923, Senator Lewis edited and published a textbook relating to removal of causes from State to Federal courts. This compendium of law and forms has been applicable to professional activities in a field in which there are many refinements and subtleties.

In 1936 he published the Law Governing Injunctions.

Senator Lewis also had a background of service abroad, representing the Senate at a convention in London in 1914, and in war service in France during the World War.

Out of the wealth of experience and intellectual and spiritual treasures of his life he gave to me, as a young Senator, suggestions and other help. He did this in a delicate manner which I accepted with gratitude. I soon found that he was doing similar acts of kindness and helpfulness to other new Senators around me. This generosity was the subject of comment among us because of the broad benevolence it expressed, including, as it did, Republicans as well as Democrats.

Senator and Mrs. Lewis, Mrs. Austin, and I have lived as near neighbors throughout our common service here. From that happy relationship we know that no eulogy to this great statesman would be adequate which failed to mention the devotion of Senator and Mrs. Lewis to each other.

Moreover, his love of fun and keen sense of humor was frequently expressed in stories, in which the joke was generally on him. This lighter side of his nature enlivened the art of conversation, which found a master in Senator Lewis. His wit and humor generally pointed up his profound observations.

The superficial aspects of Senator Lewis' colorful personality were displayed in his daily function as Democratic whip, when he rose with formal and courtly dignity to announce, in classic language, the absences of his colleagues. This flashed a little light on the scene, which drew attention to himself. The habit of inviting attention was as natural to him as any other of his characteristics. What might have been regarded as a weakness in others seemed a virtue in Senator Lewis. It was a gesture designed to enlist attention for what he had to say, and for his acts of leadership. The press publicized it and popularized his unique individuality.

The Congressional Record is a source of much fascinating material on the character of Senator Lewis. I invite attention to an episode in the Senate in 1914, when the President of the United States was under attack with reference to our relations with Mexico, and we find Senator Lewis in a role which was natural to him—defending his President.

Twenty-five years ago, as in the months preceding his demise, he was calling his colleagues' attention to the constitutional division of functions by which the executive department was vested with the responsibility of conducting current foreign relations. He was pointing to the equipment in the State Department employed by the President to keep in touch with sources of information. Provoked by his claim that Senators on the Republican side took an attitude equivalent to declaring that war ought to have been made on Mexico by the President, the Republican floor leader interrupted Senator Lewis for a question:

Does not the Senator think the time has now arrived when an embargo should be placed upon arms and munitions of war into Mexico on the northern border as well as on the seacoast?

Thereupon occurred an interchange of parliamentary thrust, parry, and ripost which exhibited Senator Lewis in the use of luxuriant vocabulary and circumlocution at one moment, and short, sharp, sententious retorts at another.

The debate became somewhat heated, when Senator Lewis admirably brought the incident to its close by the tact, grace, and kindness which was ever in his heart, notwithstanding the rapid fire and zeal of argument.

Said Senator Lewis:

The Senator from New Hampshire is in error to assume that my allusion is offensive. It was not my purpose, and while I may yet indulge in a gentle passage of arms, I assure him my sword, when leveled toward him, is tipped with a rose. If there was anything offensive in my observation, I certainly withdraw it.

In glorifying our late friend and colleague, we give prominence to another characteristic; namely, his sympathy. Senator Lewis had a feeling for a fellow when he needed a friend. It was a strong feeling. It consisted in understanding gained from his early life. It flowered throughout his years in gifts and help for many. This side of Senator Lewis' service was not known to the public, for his left hand was not permitted to know what his right hand did.

Mr. President, we who hold James Hamilton Lewis in deep and cherished regard seek to record for posterity our memory of that warm and vivid personality, with its rare individual characteristics, which will illumine the deeds that history must perpetuate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, though the fitness of the time was not altogether realized when the ceremonies of this day were ordered, it strikes me as being eminently appropriate that on this, the 29th day of May, we should pause in our legislative duties to pay our feeble words of respect and honor to the two distinguished Senators who are being memorialized today, for tomorrow all over America the countless dead will sleep beneath a wilderness of flowers, and the butterfly, ancient emblem of immortality, will flutter over every grave.

I always feel how inadequate are our efforts to pay tribute to our friends, whether they hold high station or whether they walk in the humbler paths of life, where the sun of publicity never shines, for in the hour of grief, when the sable drapery of mourning is drawn in heavy folds around us, silence itself is sometimes more eloquent and impressive than the chaste rhetoric of the scholar, or the flowing declamations of the orator. In the ministrations of affliction the downcast, full, and drooping eye sometimes speaks the sentiments of the heart in language more touching and truthful than the polished utterances of the eulogist, or the glowing phrases, clothed in beautiful imagery of the poet.

Mr. President, on an occasion such as this our minds naturally revert to the more solid and substantial things of life. We all love life, and though it be extended beyond the years of apparent usefulness, we cling to it. All nature loves life. Although knowing not life's value, the infant clings to its mother's neck in the hour of danger, and when the storm approaches the sparrow beats its own life out against the windowpane in its effort to preserve its life. We are reminded of the beautiful poem of Oliver Wendell Holmes, The Last Leaf, in which he describes how tensely, through the autumn and winter months, the last leaf clings to the tree, and he concludes-

> Let them smile, as I do now, At the old forsaken bough Where I cling.

What is this thing, Mr. President, about which we are talking today? We are not all endowed equally with intellect, or physical strength, or the power of description, or with financial genius, and those of us who sit in this distinguished body, like those who have gone before us and those who will follow us, are no doubt prone to puff ourselves up a little because of the possession of some temporary power or authority conferred upon us by a confiding constituency. But in the final assessment of the value of men's lives, who shall say that the man who sits in the Senate, or on the judge's bench, or in the Governor's chair, renders greater service to society than the man who, in the middle of the street, digs a ditch in order that a wire or pipe or cable may be laid to bring heat and light and comfort to the people?

"Bob" Ingersoll was one of America's greatest orators. He had the power of imagery and was a master of beautiful description and elegant diction. He described life as "a narrow vale between the cold and barren peaks of two eternities." He spent a large portion of his life seeking to destroy the faith men and women had in a traditional religion. Yet with all his doubt and his agnosticism, when he stood one day by the grave of his brother, he uttered the beautiful sentiment, "In the hour of death, hope sees a star, and listening love hears the rustle of a wing."

Mr. President, in contemplating the lives of Senator Core-LAND and Senator Lewis I feel no disposition to speak of one and not the other, for I served with both of them, and I honored and respected them. We did not always agree on the details of legislation, and that is perfectly natural. This would be a monotonous world if all the 2,000,000,000 men and women in it thought the same thoughts and harbored within their hearts the same sentiments and the same feelings. It is the friction of intellectual contact that gives life to deliberation and wisdom to final determination.

I recall one particular instance in which the fine heart of Senator COPELAND was displayed, soon after the great flood in the Ohio Valley, which destroyed more than $4,000,000,000 worth of property. I was anxious, in the closing hours of the session of Congress, to obtain some relief for the stricken people, and the legislation proposed was in charge of Senator COPELAND, as chairman of the Committee on Commerce. I recall that late one day he stood here in the Well of the Senate and would not consent to an adjournment, although tired and worn from his labors almost to the extent which characterized the last few hours of his life, until some relief had been granted to the people living in this stricken valley.

Senator Copeland was a man of strong convictions, of deep allegiances, of high ideals. He was a man of deep religious convictions and had all his life been an active member of the same denomination in which I myself claim membership. In all of his contests, in all of his activities, he was a gentle soul.

I have sometimes felt that the physician, the man who heals and relieves the ailments of the human body, after all, renders the greatest service that can be performed by a human being. Long before he ever attained high office, long before he had any ambition to attain high office, in countless places and in countless ways that never found expression in the public press, Senator Copeland ministered to those who suffered.

Mr. President, how shall I describe our affection and regard for the memory of that knightly spirit from Illinois of whom the senior Senator from that State has spoken with such beauty and eloquence! It seems to me James Ham-ILTON LEWIS was carved out of the chivalrous days that have gone before. He gave to his companions a breath of wholesome freshness; he gave to discussion here a brilliance of expression and of conception worthy of any man on any side of any question. And in his daily walk and in his bearing there was a gentility, a courtesy, a chivalry, a sort of intellectual and spiritual setting apart of himself as one who had been cast in a mold which no longer fashioned the character of individuals.

Our memories are rich in these associations. They inspire us to greater effort on our own part. They inspired us to make ourselves worthy of their companionship in the past, but they inspire us to be worthy of their hallowed memory in the years to come.

Mr. President, as I think of these two Senators, not as Senators, not as public officers, not as worthy and humble bearers of distinguished honors but as human beings, I am constrained to read from Holy Writ the beautiful language of the Twenty-third Psalm:

The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: He leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul: He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His name's sake.

Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me.

Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: Thou annointest my head with oil; my cup runneth

Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; and I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Lucas in the chair). The Chair recognizes the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I am honored by having an opportunity briefly to join in memorializing our late colleagues, Senator Copeland, of New York, and Senator James Hamilton Lewis, of Illinois, and adding a few words with regard to the character and services of Senator Lewis.

It is always a difficult task to pay adequate and accurate tribute to one who has departed this life, and whose relations with ourselves have been affected by friendship, association, and service.

I believe it was Arthur Henry Hallam who evoked from Lord Tennyson's pen perhaps the noblest memorial in all the English language, and today I could wish for something of the genius of that man in undertaking to give utterance to the very great affection and veneration and admiration which I entertain for Senator James Hamilton Lewis.

Some years ago I read an account in a magazine by a writer who set forth what he thought was the preparation requisite for one to be a Member of the House of Representatives or of the Senate. The writer had never served in the Congress; he probably never would serve in the Congress; but his outline of the necessary requirements for one seeking to enter the Halls of Congress were, in short, a liberal education, college degrees, and then experience in business and industry, and a variety of the activities of modern life. I am very glad that such requirements are not constitutional requirements.

It seems to me that Senator James Hamilton Lewis perhaps came as near to having the requirements set forth in that article as any Senator with whom I have ever been privileged to serve. He was a cosmopolite. He was born in Virginia, which is a good State in which to be born and to live when one is young and has the opportunity of reflecting upon the majesty and the greatness of Virginia when it was young. He was educated in Georgia, a great old State of fine tradition. And then as a young man he grew up in the West-in the West that was growing, in the West that was young. There he developed, catching a new conception of modern American life. And then in his maturity he went to the great metropolis of the Middle West, which in a sense is the countinghouse for that great and splendid area. And so he had a background from the standpoint of geography and education and experience possessed by few men.

Our late colleague served as a soldier during the Spanish-American War. He had military experience in Cuba and in Puerto Rico. Back in the nineties he served with distinction as a Member of Congress from the State of Washington. While I have not verified this statement, I doubt not that Senator Lewis' service in the Congress, while interrupted, covered a longer range of time than that of any man now living and serving in either branch of the Congress of the United States. It covered a period of more than 40 years.

He was a lawyer, not alone an accomplished lawyer in the courtroom, but a legal authority, the author of several works on the law. He was a statesman, but equally as important, he was a politician, and I use that term in its highest and best significance. He was politician enough to get elected; then he was statesman enough to serve his people well and patriotically.

He was widely traveled. He knew many foreign countries and many foreign places, not alone from books but from actual contact with foreign institutions and foreign races.

What were his personal qualities? He had in abundance those attractive personal qualities that make one man love another man. He was gallant, courteous, kindly, considerate. He was a counselor of those of us who were his juniors in service. I recollect on one or two occasions when I was either engaged in a contest for reelection or was looking forward to the possibility of one, Senator Lewis of his own motion came to me and made suggestions as to the proper manner in which to conduct the campaign, and he somewhat checked up on the possibilities of the probable candidate who would oppose me.

Senator Lewis was perhaps as well read in English literature as any man in this Chamber. What is more than being well read, he knew how to use his command and his mastery of English literature in the debate and in the interchange here upon the floor of the Senate.

He was a lovable, kindly, delightful man. He was more than that. He was not only terrific in debate when roused to the full measure of his powers but he was a great orator. I remember some years ago, when I was a Member of the House, sitting in this Chamber and hearing Senator Lewis in the memorable debate following the World War, when the titanic issues involving the League of Nations and our relations with Europe were under consideration. I heard him deliver one of the most attractive and outstanding addresses in all that debate. I now commend to Senators two great orations which Senator Lewis delivered in this Chamber. One was on the 6th of December 1918, while the Peace Conference was meeting. With marvelous perception Senator Lewis then clearly outlined the issues which later arose as the result of the Treaty of Versailles. Again, on the 3d day of January 1919 he replied to a number of Senators on the other side of the Chamber who had attacked his position. He made an outstanding address, which commanded the attention and admiration of those who heard it.

Mr. President, on occasions such as this, when we come to grieve over the loss of our friends, we frequently meditate. We wonder and conjecture whether this little span that we spend here is all there is of life. Scientists tell us that matter is indestructible; that it is merely transformed from one form into another; that the cigar which is consumed by fire is not destroyed but is merely resolved into ashes, vapor, and smoke, and that all its essential elements are still in existence, though in another form. Scientists tell us that the electricity which comes to us from the clouds is not destroyed but is transmuted into heat, light, and energy, and goes back into the great reservoir of Nature in another form: that the flower which blooms in the spring, withers, and dies is not dead but goes back to mingle with Mother Earth in the great chemistry of Nature to bring forth another flower in another spring.

So, Mr. President, whatever be our inability to look beyond the curtain that vells the future, I cannot believe that the spirit which animated the now cold and silent dust of James Hamilton Lewis, and which glowed and flashed from his eyes in debate, the intellect which charmed us and moved us on the floor of the Senate, and the eloquence which thrilled his hearers are dead forever. I believe that his spirit has gone out to influence our own lives and the activities of this body, and that it has become a priceless heritage, not to the future world alone but to American public life; and that, like indestructible physical matter, it will go on to enrich and ennoble the generation in which he lived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY].

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. President, it is difficult for one who has been chosen to fill a small portion of the void created by the departure of a great man to speak of him in terms adequate to his greatness, or in tones normal to the occasion.

James Hamilton Lewis, by any standard of appraisal, was a great man, a man sufficiently great to be so recognized in his own day and by his own generation.

The people of Illinois and of the Nation suffered an irreparable loss when he was summoned to eternity. Yet he left to us a heritage of glorious memories, a heritage of inspiration, a heritage founded on his unfaltering trust in the democratic processes. Senators who were his colleagues and friends know that he was a man of inflexible principle, a man actuated only and always by motives of unquestionable sincerity. A patriot always, a partisan seldom, and then only in the best sense of the word, his life was dedicated to his State and to his Nation. His was a life devoted to the democratic principles which he well exemplified.

We of Illinois, his adopted State, revered him. We possessed for him an affection based on our knowledge of his rare qualities. We appreciated the depth of his statesmanship; we understood the breadth of his scholarship; we delighted in the warmth of his friendship; we rejoiced in his triumphs.

Illinois has never been hesitant in awarding its laurels to adopted sons who possessed outstanding qualities. Lincoln, son of Kentucky; Stephen A. Douglas, son of New England, and Grant, son of Ohio, all found their places in history because Illinois gave them their opportunity.

The same thing is true of James Hamilton Lewis, a son of the Old Dominion. As my colleague [Mr. Lucas] has said, he was the only man the people of Illinois ever elected to succeed himself in the Senate since the Constitution was changed so as to provide for the direct election of Senators. That fact alone demonstrates the faith and the confidence the people of Illinois had in him.

Those who knew him or who knew his story could not help but regard him as the personification of American initiative. His career demonstrated the opportunity provided by a democracy. His boyhood was spent amid scenes of desolation left in the wake of a great Civil War. Everything he had, everything he became, he obtained for himself. No task was too lowly if it contributed to the objective he sought. He worked as a dockhand and a lumberjack, all that he might become, as he did, a learned lawyer, a valiant soldier, an outstanding statesman, and a distinguished author.

His individualism and extreme courtesy were but the manifestations of his colorful character and innate chivalry. Kindly, tolerant, and possessed of a keenly perceptive and analytical mind, his counsel and advice were sought by many. A profound student of government and international affairs, and a gifted orator from whom flowed scintillating phrases of rhetorical perfection, he was a most important influence in the deliberations of this body and the councils of the Democratic Party.

Alert to the needs of a changing world, he championed the cause of the common man. The welfare of his constituents and the American people was his paramount concern.

Senator Lewis and I were friends for many years. Almost 30 years ago he was president and I was secretary of the Webster College of Law in Chicago. Never did he lose his democratic spirit and common touch. I am reminded of an incident which occurred at the Illinois State fair just a year ago. An elderly farmer approached the Senator and said, "Senator Lewis, do you remember me? I met you at our county fair a few months ago." The Senator acknowledged the salutation gracefully, beamed upon the man, and said, "Why, of course I do, my friend, but I am deeply flattered that you remember me."

The spirit of James Hamilton Lewis will permeate this Chamber for years to come. He will always occupy a unique place in the saga of the Senate and in the annals of the Illinois which he loved and by which he was loved.

This, then, is the man I have been designated to succeed in the Senate. Truly do I recognize the magnitude of the task I have been given. Earnestly do I hope and pray that I may represent my State and Nation as faithfully as did he.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 139) was unanimously agreed to. ADJOURNMENT TO WEDNESDAY

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of our departed colleagues, I move that the Senate adjourn until Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Wednesday, May 31, 1939, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 29, 1939

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. George S. Henninger, D. D., pastor, Fifty-first Street Methodist Church, Indianapolis, Ind., offered the following

Our Heavenly Father, we thank Thee for the "sweet hour of prayer," whether it be in the silence of one's inner life or the place of worship or in the busy walk of life.

We thank Thee for that blessed "hour of prayer" of childhood, when simple faith reached Thy throne.

For that hour of prayer when young manhood was struggling for something—sure and steadfast. That hour of prayer when the quest for struggle and combat seemed sweet. That hour of prayer in older life when the sands of time seemed to run fast through life's hourglass. Yes, Father, we thank Thee for the "sweet, sacred hour of prayer."

Today at this hour in this historic place we make use of its privileges.

More than 3,000 years ago a wise and good man said, "In all thy ways acknowledge Him and He will direct thy paths." Our Heavenly Father, we believe that.

This sacred moment in the Hall of Congress says to the world, "We believe that."

We would in all our ways acknowledge Thee.

Give, our Heavenly Father, to the Honorable Speaker of this House divine guidance and direction. We thank Thee for his fairness and desire to do and be right.

Give to every Member a new sense of Thy willingness to guide. We dare not attempt to go through these days of tremendous responsibility alone. Millions of homes and firesides wait with anxiety as to the doings of these men. Theirs is a sacred and holy trust, given them by the franchise of their neighbors and friends. May they always prove themselves worthy of that trust.

Bless those near to them by the ties of love and affection.

Bless our President and his advisers. Help all of us to feel the sacredness of the words of God when He said, "If My people who are called by My name shall confess and acknowledge their sins, and will turn to Me, I will heal their land."

Help us to take this simple road to recovery.

As a nation, and as individuals, we have sinned in many ways. Forgive us, O God, we pray Thee. Heal our land as by Thy promise. Lead us in a plain path, and we will thank Thee in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, May 25, 1939, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 5765. An act to authorize commissioning aviation cadets in the Naval and Marine Corps Reserves upon completion of training, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested: S. 2009. An act to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by extending its application to additional types of carriers and transportation and modifying certain provisions thereof, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1569) entitled "An act to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. HATCH, Mr. BANKHEAD, and Mr. CAPPER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5324) entitled "An act to amend the National Housing Act, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 1369. An act to authorize necessary facilities for the Coast Guard in the interest of national defense and the performance of its maritime police functions.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution (on May 25, 1939):

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. BERT LORD, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative the Senate do now take a recess until 12 o'clock meridian tomorrow.

The message also announced that pursuant to the foregoing the Presiding Office appointed Mr. WAGNER and Mr. MEAD as the members of said committee on the part of the Senate.

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 205, Rept. No. 697) which was referred to the House calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 205

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 6466, a bill to provide for and promote the general welfare of the United States by supplying to the people a more liberal distribution and increase of purchasing power, retiring certain citizens from gainful employment, improving and stabilizing gainful employment for other citizens, stimulating agricultural and industrial production and general business, and alleviating the hazards and insecurity of old age and unemployment, etc., and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 4 hours to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a resolution recently adopted by the Southern Governors' Conference, in which conference was denounced the administration of the wage-hour law, asking for a congressional investigation of the personnel and the policies of those administering the act.

Mr. Speaker, this is the same Governors' conference that on January 8 last year came here and resoluted in favor of the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business on the calendar for Wednesday next may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to ask the majority leader a question. The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Is it proper to assume that the Hendricks bill, the so-called Townsend bill, will be up for consideration on Wednesday?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is correct.

Mr. MAPES. The rule and the bill will be taken up the first thing on Wednesday?

Mr. RAYBURN. The first thing on Wednesday.

Mr. MAPES. The rule provides for 4 hours of general debate on the bill. Of course, there will be 1 hour on the rule. Would it be possible to enter into an agreement that the vote on any motion to recommit, and on the final vote on the passage of the bill, may be put over until Thursday?

Mr. RAYBURN. Replying to that question, I will say that a great many Members on both sides feel that it will be very difficult for them to return by Wednesday, and they have appealed to me that the vote may go over until Thursday. I will say, however, that I have made no promise, but have told each and every Member that in all probability there would be a vote on Thursday.

Mr. MAPES. I wonder if the gentleman would not be willing to ask unanimous consent that the roll call on the motion to recommit and on the final passage of the bill shall not be had until Thursday.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, before that request is offered, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will recall that representatives of the Ways and Means Committee, in asking for this rule, wanted 8 hours for general debate; that the Rules Committee thought that 4 hours would probably be sufficient; but it was practically agreed by the committee that if there should develop demand for the vote going over until the following day, the committee would join in that request.

Mr. MAPES. Yes. I think that is an accurate statement. Mr. RAYBURN. I will say to the gentleman that it is perfectly agreeable to me, although I have made no promises to anyone, and I would not have done so without consulting with the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he were here, and the gentleman from Michigan, if the gentleman from Massachusetts were not here. I am perfectly willing to make that agreement, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MAPES. So that the membership can definitely understand, will the gentleman make that request?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, if it is a proper request, that the vote, if there be one, on a motion to recommit the Townsend-plan bill and the vote on the final passage may be deferred until Thursday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

DEBT WEEK

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, last week was known as "debt week" in the United States. This was part of a political program which, I understand, was approved by the Republican National Committee. In a large display window in Washington—and this may have been true of other cities—was shown a graphic picture, with lights flashing on and off to attract attention and to impress the passer-by with the "terrible times" present and to come. There was even a tiny, blue-eyed baby, with Hollywood eyelashes and face stained with tears, because on the day of its birth it had been given to understand that it was deeply in debt.

Each time the lights flashed on and off in the political picture, thousands or millions, or maybe it was billions, of dollars were supposedly spent, the impression sought to be conveyed being that the money was wantonly wasted. A "tall" feature of the designedly depressing display was the Empire State Building in New York City, the accompanying statement explaining that for the money spent under the New Deal so many hundred such buildings might have been constructed, as if there is need for additional buildings of this kind any more than for any other "white elephant." Striving to make the scare story more complete, a great arrow directed the onlooker to step around to the other side and "see who pays." In doing so, the spectator looked into a mirror, seeing only his own image.

As I paused to look at the political picture referred to, I thought of the possibilities of another, a very different display-one confined to facts.

First, Mr. Speaker, the window I have in mind would be based on history rather than on prophecy. "Lest we forget," or possibly "1932 and you," would be the lead line in type big and bold. To truly portray a period of deep shadows the scene should be dimly lighted, the few lights being red, business and all else having come to a stop by the end of the Hoover era. But because the lesson must not be lost, I would have the picture well lighted. As was said a long time ago, "Given light, the people will find their way."

What would I show in my window in answer to the Republican "debt week" window?

I would show a bank, one of more than 10,000 that closed their doors under recent Republican administration, and in front of this bank would be a crowd of anxious depositors, all fearful that they would lose their savings, for in those days there was no bank-guaranty law, as now.

I would show a scene here in Washington, in the Capital City of our Nation, with veterans of the World War being driven out by troops after they had come, as law-abiding citizens, to plead their cause.

I would show a freight train on which were crowded young men, and perhaps here and there a young woman, all stealing rides, going just anywhere, too often going to ruin, because in those days there were no C. C. C. camps where youth is trained in citizenship and taught worth-while work, as a result of which there is upbuilding—physically, mentally, and morally.

I would show the most dismal of all places, an old-time poorhouse, the haunting fear of many aged men and women, for in those days there was no Social Security Act, no oldage assistance, no far-reaching humanitarian movement, as now.

I would show part of a big city, with its miserable sections, its disease-inducing tenements, where the unfortunate existed, rather than lived, for then the low-cost housing program, providing modern, comfortable places of residence, had not been put into effect.

I would show a farm home at evening time, dimly lighted, because then there was no R. E. A., the conveniences of electric light and power being for city folks or very few of the more fortunate on farms.

I would show a road, practically impassable during weeks at a time, leading to a rural home, the road poor because the almost 100,000 miles of improved highways, largely made possible through W. P. A. and P. W. A., had not then been constructed.

I would show a typical town or small city, without a safe and suitable school building, with no swimming pool, no adequate playgrounds or parks, and sorely in need of modern waterworks and sewer systems.

I would show grain and livestock, a sort of miniature county fair, and on each head of livestock or bushel of grain I would place 1932 prices—hogs, $2.80 per hundredweight; wheat, 25 to 30 cents per bushel; corn, 12 to 20 cents per bushel; wool, 11 cents per pound, and so on.

Because so much space would be required to truly picture the old days, and dark days they were, I should not attempt to show all.

Life is not "dollared off." If it were I might show in the window I have in mind one check—a check from "Uncle Sam" to the farmers of the United States—a check for a billion dollars.

Today one may look about and on every hand see cause for rejoicing. See happy and hopeful people, see many modern school buildings, attractive grounds and recreational facilities; thousands of miles of highways and streets, parks, and playgrounds; see a million town homes and farm homes, saved under the H. O. L. C. and the Farm Credit Administration, each such home worth more to America than all the Empire State Buildings that can ever be constructed. In short, Mr. Speaker, in every county in the United States are evidences of progress, permanent improvements, which make for health and happiness. I would have us as a people get away from the politics and the pessimism of the "debt week" window. In a window more typical of the real spirit of the best nation in all the world, your country and mine, the good old U. S. A., I would place a card on which was printed—

No matter where you live, look about and you will see that under the New Deal many fine things have come to your community and to you. Happily, the old days are dead.

Then especially for youth, hope of every age in every land, I would add:

Be glad that worth-while things are yours today, glad that tomorrow will be better than yesterday.

WE MUST HAVE A NATIONAL OLD-AGE PENSION—IT MUST BE UNI-FORM THROUGHOUT THE NATION—IT MUST GUARANTEE SECURITY TO THE AGED AND OPPORTUNITY TO YOUTH

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not, as we have no legislative program today, I see no reason for gentlemen limiting themselves to 1 minute in asking for time to address the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, we have been giving consideration to the matter of social security since the depression of 1929 when millions of American people helplessly stood by and saw their savings of a lifetime swept away and could do nothing to check the terrible catastrophe. This consideration has grown constantly until today throughout the Nation, and in this Congress it has attained such proportions that it is readily recognized as one of the major domestic problems confronting us. In the next few days we will vote upon this important matter.

This administration among the many proposals for corrective legislation gave to the American people the Social Security Act now in effect. This was a step in the right direction but in actual practice has proved so totally inadequate that its defects have only had the tendency of crystallizing public opinion throughout the Nation upon something more workable and more equitable. By the enactment of the Social Security Act we have been able to secure a decision of the United States Supreme Court that such laws are constitutional and we need no longer concern ourselves with that difficulty.

WE MUST HAVE AN IMPROVED PROGRAM

I, like every other Member of Congress, have received thousands of communications and petitions urging that action be taken. I, also, like every other Congressman, know the tremendous need for a sensible, workable old-age pension. I know, as we all do, the untold misery, the heartaches, the despair, and suffering that is occurring in millions of homes of America, all due to social and economic inequities. I have many able and thoughtful constituents who cannot hope personally to profit directly by any pension legislation we might pass, yet who are strong advocates of a sound pension proposal. I received a communication from Mr. C. A. Drinkard, of Wenatchee, Wash., a constituent of mine, and a gentleman whose judgment and views concerning the money question and the old-age pension question are deserving of most serious consideration because of his recognized ability and understanding concerning such matters.

A COMMON GROUND FOR ALL PENSION ADVOCATES

In this letter he suggested the basis upon which we should give consideration to any old-age pension proposal that is submitted for enactment. They are as follows:

First:

The pension issue must be dealt with by Congress either as a matter of a pauper's relief or as a matter of an inalienable right of the pensioner—the inalienable right to life and, therefore, an inalienable right to the things that sustain life. choose one or the other of these two viewpoints. Congress must Shall the Government adopt a pension policy with the one thought of giving relief to the needy, or shall it approach the problem with the intent of making it a part of an economic recovery program?

Shall the pension issue be approached with the understanding that the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few, the development of scientific methods of production, and the invention of labor-saving machinery have brought about a condition of unemployment on so vast a scale as to make it absolutely necessary to provide for a large army of unemployed constantly; or shall it be considered a temporary matter and one that has no connection considered a temporary matter and one that has no connection with general economic conditions?

Is it not wise and just to establish a real social security by adopting a program of real protection of all who find themselves unable to properly provide for themselves and their dependents? Is it not possible by such program to create a greater buying power, a more equitable distribution of income, and at the same time retard wealth concentration?

Which shall be placed first—our profit system or the health, happiness, and life of some 40,000,000 of our people?

WE CAN NOW VOTE

Mr. Speaker we will be given a chance to vote on this pension issue now for the first time after 6 years of struggle, even though the bill is submitted by the Rules Committee under rigid restrictions prohibiting any amendment. I feel that the suggestions made by Mr. Drinkard are very helpful in aiding us in arriving at a proper decision, and here I want to state that Dr. Townsend is entitled to great credit for his efforts.

STILL DIFFERENCES OF OPINION

There are Members of this House who think and feel that the pension proposal contained in H. R. 6466, upon which we will soon be asked to vote, is quite complete and workable. There are others in this body who find fault with certain provisions of this bill because they sincerely doubt its workability. There are still others who oppose it because they are prejudiced against Dr. Townsend or have had some unpleasant experiences with some of the leaders in that movement, but all of us are going to be called upon to record our position definitely upon this pension issue. I am glad that this opportunity is presented to us. I regret that we will be limited in the matter of correcting any weakness that might exist or of adding strength to the already strong features of the bill.

If we apply to a consideration of this bill the five questions propounded by my friend and constituent, Mr. Drinkard, of Wenatchee, then it seems to me, even though we may be critical of some of the mechanical features of H. R. 6466, which is known here as the Townsend pension bill, still it is deserving of our support, and I shall vote for it.

THE GENERAL WELFARE FEDERATION BILL

The other pension proposal which is an outgrowth of the Townsend pension movement and which is generally known as the General Welfare Act (H. R. 11), has likewise been reintroduced in this session of Congress and is now known as H. R. 5620. This is a well-considered legislative proposal. Its author and draftsman, Arthur L. Johnson, is an able lawyer and a profound student of this subject, and this bill meets all the tests that my friend, Mr. Drinkard, would apply to a national old-age pension act. It, too, should have been submitted to us for consideration.

JUSTICE DEMANDS SECURITY

Mr. Speaker, one thing is certain, I am sure, to all of us, and that is that the justice of the demands for individual security of all Americans, of all ages, cannot much longer be denied. While the answer to this irresistible demand may not be the plan of any one man or group of men, nevertheless the demand must be answered, and it should be answered by enacting the best possible national pension law that can be obtained and then correcting weaknesses as they show themselves from time to time. My good friend, Mr. Drinkard, in his letter to me states that he favors the General Welfare Act, known as H. R. 11, amended, because it rests upon an income-tax base. The latest Townsend proposal—that which we will be asked to vote upon-has now shifted from a transaction tax to an income tax, and the advantage of such a tax applies now with equal force to both the Townsend General Welfare Act and the Johnson General Welfare Act.

GROSS INCOME TAX

Mr. Drinkard, referring to the income-tax base for pensions, states this whole matter so clearly in a couple of paragraphs in his letter that I am going to quote them. He says:

It creates a system of forced circulation. Under it every month some eight or nine hundred million dollars will be collected from all over the Nation and then redistributed throughout the country according to population.

The great majority of those who receive the money when it is distributed, because of their poverty, will be forced to spend it. Thus the bill creates a Government controlled system of forced circulation.

Thus the bill is bound to create buying power; to cause prices to advance because of the increased demand. The increased demand will call for increased production. The increased production will call for the employment of more laborers. Taking up the slack in production and unemployment are two things Congress has been trying to do.

The real pinch is it hits the tax dodger. The rich and the well to do know that you cannot pay $8,000,000,000 a year to 10,000,000 poor people without taking anything from them. They are fighting it because they do not want to give up any of the advantages they now have.

There is one thing I fear they do not understand. The ship of state upon which they are blissfully riding is sinking. It struck the snag of too great profiteering, too great concentration of wealth, too unjust distribution of the annual income, and she is badly listing. Unless some radical changes are made, she will soon sink. soon sink.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I want to say that I take a justifiable pride in the fact that I was perhaps the first Member in this body who publicly proclaimed, as the Con-GRESSIONAL RECORD of June 15, 1937, will show, the proposal, that a pay-as-you-go national old-age pension program should rest upon a gross income tax. I gave my support to the General Welfare Act proposed by Arthur Johnson, who, following my address in Congress, submitted such an old-age pension bill; and I congratulate the leaders of the Townsend movement in accepting the gross income tax as a tax formula by which the money is to be raised. Of course, this will result in Uncle Sam becoming the master of the Nation's purse. Of course, it will result in driving the money changers from power. We are now really approaching a common ground upon which we may all stand. In truth and in fact, a universal old-age pension will be a new hope; a joy to millions of fine people, and actually restore that mysterious and evenescent thing we call "confidence." [Applause.]

COMMUNICATION FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES— RESALE PRICES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

THE WHITE HOUSE, Washington, May 24, 1939.

My Dear Mr. Speaker: My attention has been called to H. R. 3838, which would render legal in the District of Columbia contracts for the maintenance of resale prices. A study of "Fair Trade Acts," which is a term applied to resale-price maintenance statutes, has been begun by the Federal Trade Commission, and the Temporary National Economic Committee has under consideration a study of general marketing laws, including fair trade acts and statutes having to do with prices and price policies. In view thereof, this bill should not, in my judgment, receive the consideration of the Congress until the aforesaid studies of the subject matter of such legislation have been reported upon by the Temporary National Economic Committee and by the Federal Trade Commission.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD,

Speaker, House of Representatives,

Washington, D. C.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEES

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 206

Resolved, That Wirt Courtney, of Tennessee, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the following standing committees of the House of Representatives, to wit: Elections No. 1, Claims, Immigration and Naturalization, and Census.

The resolution was agreed to; and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and to include therein a radio address by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Smith].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record and to include therein a statement addressed "To the Republicans of the United States," signed by the Governor and other elective Republican State officials of Michigan and the Republican Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan; a letter to the senior Senator from Michigan, Hon. Arthur H. Vandenberg, from the Republican Members of Congress from the State, and his reply thereto, all relating to the drafting of Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg as the Republican candidate for the Presidency in the next campaign.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

RELIEF AND WORK RELIEF

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein a table which I have prepared with reference to the relief question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, in order that we may have before us a comparative picture of the relief situation in the different States, the number of the W. P. A. employees, the local relief expenditures, the number of relief cases, the percentage of W. P. A. expenditures, and the combined dollar average spent for W. P. A. and local and State purposes for relief, and the percentage of unemployables, I have worked out a table giving the percentage in each State as it relates to each of these items. I place it in the Record at this point in order that when we come to consider the relief problem we shall have these facts available and the membership may have an opportunity to study them.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how much space will the table occupy in the Record?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, the consent has already been granted. I presume it will take a page, I may say to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PARSONS. I did not hear the gentleman propound such a request. I understood that he asked merely to revise and extend his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman's request included the table he is now discussing.

The table referred to follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and to include therein an article which appeared in the New York Times of May 25, 1939.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and to include therein quotations from certain writers and speeches by the Honorable James Hamilton Lewis, late a Senator from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SMITH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and to include therein quotations from a letter and resolution received from the American Indian Federation and also to extend my own remarks in the Record on the plight of the American families of this country.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. Burdick]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 25 minutes in order to discuss the sugar situation, but before propounding the unanimous-consent request I would like to have these gentlemen propound their unanimous-consent requests to extend their own remarks in the Record so that they will not have to wait.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman later to propound his unanimous-consent request.

THE LATE JAMES A. FREAR

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Hull]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I regret to announce that James A. Frear, a member of this body for 22 years, passed away on Sunday morning, May 28, 1939, at the age of 78 years.

Mr. Frear was born at Hudson, Wis., in October 1861. He came to Washington with his parents when he was 18 years LXXXIV—398 of age, and while gaining departmental experience he graduated from the National Law University. Immediately upon his graduation he returned to Hudson, Wis., where he was elected city attorney in 1894. He became district attorney of St. Croix County, Wis., in 1897. He continued therein until 1901. He was elected to the Wisconsin Assembly in 1902, and later to the Wisconsin State Senate in 1904. In 1907 he was elected Secretary of State of the State of Wisconsin, in which capacity he served 6 years. In 1914 he was elected as a Progressive-Republican to the Sixty-third Congress, and served in each consecutive Congress until 1934, when he voluntarily retired.

Since his retirement from Congress he has been engaged in the practice of law in the city of Washington. A man of high ideals, strict integrity, and great ability, Mr. Frear's long career in the public service was characterized by faithful service to his State and to his country. He was widely known and was highly esteemed by all who knew him.

Mr. Frear leaves his wife, Mrs. Harriet Frear, a son Philip A. Frear, and a daughter, Mrs. Allen Johnson, all residents of the city of Washington.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record. I have received an estimate from the Public Printer, which states that the additional cost to extend these remarks will be $90. I ask unanimous consent to extend these remarks in the Record, notwithstanding the estimate of the Public Printer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. Sheppard]?

There was no objection.

THE EFFICIENCY AND LOYALTY OF THE UNITED STATES NAVY

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the Record and to include therein a discussion of the various topics in the newspapers of today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. Thorkelson]?

There was no objection.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, the United States Navy carries on in its traditional efficiency and loyalty to the Nation, to the people, to the service, and to the men who serve in the Navy. This was clearly shown in the recent disaster of the U.S. S. Squalus. Let us be loyal to those alive by keeping faith with those who died. Congress may keep faith by providing for their dependents and for education of the children whose dads sleep in the aft compartment of the Squalus.

As we read the log of the survivors we are again impressed with the discipline of the crew, for they said: "No one was excited. We waited for help from our shipmates. We were quiet, so as to conserve oxygen." And this is the spirit in which the Navy meets its problems.

So these 33 members of the crew waited in the forward hold of the Squalus, under 240 feet of water, on the bottom of the Atlantic Ocean. In my mind's eye I pictured the methodical manner in which each and every one stepped forward to rescue, with one thought in mind—to help those in the stricken ship. I can also understand the feeling of the imprisoned crew when they heard the first signal tapped on the deck of the ship. They had already heard the propeller of the sister ship, the U.S. S. Nautilus. A happy moment, certainly, when they heard the signal of the diver.

It is difficult for us to understand the hazards of this rescue work, not only after locating the marker buoy but also after having anchored in position. When my colleagues can imagine the diving bell swung over and lowered from a derrick 240 feet into the semidarkness of the Atlantic and the divers directing the bell squarely over the rescue hatch, the magnitude of this work is only partly appreciated.

To the Navy it is all in a day's work; it is a duty to which they have obligated themselves. The Navy is loyal to this obligation and carries on with perfect discipline. The only compensation the crew receives is "Well done," and the ship an "E" rating.

I suppose a few of my seagoing colleagues have seen rescue work at sea, and I am not addressing myself to them, but rather to those unfamiliar with such work. I recall in April 1936, when the fleet received orders to spot three land planes afloat in the shark-infested Pacific, south of Central America. As we swung ahead full speed to the rescue of these planes, I recalled having seen the same day two 8-foot hammerhead sharks off the starboard bow. Thinking of this, I wondered if the empty gas tanks would keep the planes afloat and the crew safe from these aquatic monsters. The only disappointment registered by our crew was in not being first to find the planes.

The Navy is efficient, and I look forward to the day when Congress will also be efficient, so that an "E" may face the flag over the Speaker's rostrum, instead of the clock now hung there, making wasted time. Congress must again take charge, and the best time to begin is now. The invisible government and the "White House Congress" has been in charge too long for the general welfare of the country. These constitutional saboteurs have by their own acts classified themselves as incompetent, and a national menace.

However, I want to compliment the legal staffs in the White House Congress and other Federal departments for the legislation they draw. It is voluminous and most of it is in conflict with the Constitution or clearly unconstitutional. The legislation drafted by a portion of the 2,500 or more attorneys in the Federal employ is for one purpose. and that is to build complete Federal control by legislation. In other words, these 2,500 attorneys, who are supported by the taxpayers, enmesh these taxpayers in legislation destructive to them, and to the Nation as well. I realize, of course, that a great majority of these 2,500 attorneys are sincerely loyal to the people, and although falling over each other, they are still carrying on. I am not speaking of them. I refer to the new clan of lawyers. who, in 4 years, have learned to write legislation so obscure that it fools the majority in Congress. To those who glibly say "That should not be hard," let me reply. We have about 240 lawyers in the House who would "spot" this new "hot dog" legislation if they could understand it, and understanding of it has been tried, but those who have relied on the Constitution for a premise find there is no justification for this new legislation, so it is passed, I suppose, in the belief that there is a new document in the beautiful marble structure on Capitol Hill.

I also realize that someone may take exception to this presumption on my part, but if they believe I am wrong, I invite them to read the United States Constitution and justify their legislation upon it.

I want to say at this point that I expect to be called a Nazi or Fascist, because I honor my obligation to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution and the people's rights. I even expect to be ridiculed or smeared, if you please, by the Asiatic Communist and invisible government's press because of my convictions. Be that as it may, I shall not abandon the fundamental principles of our Nation for a "mess of pottage."

The afore-mentioned group of 2,500 attorneys employed in the Federal Government are distributed among the many departments and bureaus, and it is this group that drafts legislation for all the Federal departments and bureaus. The people should understand that such legislation is drafted solely for the benefit of those departments and bureaus, and not for the people. It follows, therefore, when such legislation is passed by Congress, the people's rights are gradually restricted until they become enslaved in a legal structure, which is in reality the beginning of all despotic governments.

We have much evidence of this today. I have in my possession 16 Senate and House bills for regulation of radio broadcasting alone. If these bills are enacted into legislation, no one but the Federal Government and its agents will be permitted to broadcast and tell bedtime stories to the people. That is practically what such legislation means. In other words, I, speaking as I do in this address, would be barred from the use of the broadcasting stations, and the people who own recording machines would be prevented from using them for recording; yet the Federal Government itself would have the right to all broadcasting and recording privileges in the fullest extent. That in itself is sufficient evidence of usurpation of rights and destruction of free speech, the beginning American ogpu.

A few examples of these bills are S. 1520, S. 517, and H. R. 5791, and there are many more, which I shall not discuss at this time. It is my intention, however, to inform the public that the greater number of this pending legislation is for no other purpose than to keep facts from the people. It is now up to the public to express themselves in opposition to this censorship of free speech. Broadcasting is about the only chance left by which truth may be imparted to the people, for many of the papers are now closed to those who expound constitutional government.

One of these bills, H. R. 2981, introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Celler], is entitled to special mention, because its purpose is to protect squibs, clothed in obscurity but with a definite purpose, in which the authors are expert. This bill, if enacted, will protect the sponsors and the owners of the stations from liability when they allow striped quadrupeds to contaminate the air with personal innuendoes. The F. C. C. is now a drag on the taxpayers, and should be cut in numbers to reduce the administrative cost of this Bureau. This can be done if Congress conveniently forgets to appropriate money to sustain subversive legislation.

Subversive legislation is that which in reality is written under the direction of the invisible government and sent down through its agents until it reaches some Member of Congress, who becomes its dupe in the introduction of such legislation. In other words, such Member unknowingly becomes an agent of the invisible government by introducing legislation favorable to it. If the bills are studied carefully, the Members will find that there is no actual necessity for such legislation, but in the passing of it truth is restricted and facts are prevented from being broadcast. It does not, however, restrict broadcasting of subversive propaganda by undercover agents of the invisible government, for they have convenient and servile contacts.

There is another broadcasting infant in the offing—H. R. 2721—introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Celler]. It is a high-powered naval broadcasting station at Arlington, Va., to be called PAZ, which means "peace" in Portuguese. There is no provision for the Government's propaganda bureau to build such broadcasting station, so the Navy is used as an excuse for this appropriation. The station is to cost $700,000, with an additional operating cost of $100,000 per year. This will be charged to the taxpayers. The sole purpose of this station is to spend more money on a bigger and better publicity bureau for the New Deal, or the invisible government. This station is presumably constructed to promote friendship with South American republics, and the irony of it is that American industries have already been kicked out of Mexico, Venezuela, and, I read in the Evening Star of May 27, 1939:

Santiago, Chile, May 27.—United States and British oil companies in Chile were authoritatively reported tonight to have been notified officially that the Government would establish shortly a state monopoly for the sale and distribution of petroleum products. The foreign companies were said to have been advised to liquidate their organizations within 3 months.

In the Washington Post, May 28, appeared the following:

In March 1938, Mexico appropriated properties of American and British companies which the latter valued at $400,000,000, and 2 years ago Bolivia canceled concessions of the Standard Oil Co.

These are examples of central South American good-neighbor policy, and it makes the United States an international laughing stock. The Army and Navy should have been sent to audit the books of the first nation that "pulled this shenanigan."

It is well to bear in mind that all South American nations owe money to the United States, and our private capital has developed mines and oil industries in these countries, just as was done in Mexico. We have millions upon millions of dollars invested south of us, and it was only recently that Brazil borrowed one hundred and twenty millions from the United States, while Nicaraugua has asked for $2,000,000. This should be of considerable interest to the taxpayers in the United States.

It will be seen by those who read this, that I am one of the so-called "common" or "middle class." We are composed of patriotic members of American labor, industry, business, and professions. We total better than 90 percent of the population. It is this group alone which now can set the Nation right. We are sandwiched between the invisible government, the money powers, and "rubber stamp" politicians, those who do the bidding of the invisible government's agents. I do not believe this group, which is less than 10 percent of the population, can intimidate us, even though they might try to deprive us of arms and armed protection. I understand that legislation is now contemplated which will deny the people a right which they have always had, that is the right to own arms without permission of the Federal Government. The purpose of such legislation is to disarm the American public, so that they will be in no better position than were the Ethiopians. They fought with clubs and spears, and we will be protecting ourselves with conversation; but, mind you, criminals or agents of the invisible government do as they please, and those who are anxious for this legislation close their eyes to that group, while law-abiding, patriotic citizens are disarmed. In making this statement, I am not unmindful of the havoc wrought by a small Japanese force against 400,000,000 unarmed and defenseless Chinese. But be that as it may, let us now analyze this invisible government.

The invisible government is far reaching, and in it we will find the gentlemen who control gold, money, and credit. In this group we also find the so-called "gypsy" or "roaming ambassadors," such as the late Colonel House, whose philosophy is set forth in Philip Dru, Administrator, and Gabriel Over the White House. We also find important individuals with a proper and at all times convenient entree to the Government, for the Government's tolerance is necessary to protect these un-American activities.

This system reaches a little further, because it includes the so-called "liberals," a group which is composed of the "pink," the "red," the "ists," and "isms." These will be found widely distributed throughout the whole subversive category. They are found in the ranks of business and in the radical ranks of labor. They are the underground workers for the invisible government, but are themselves in many instances unaware of the purpose they serve to the higher-ups.

The next group is the murder squad of the invisible government, those who for a price, or by the drawing of a straw, killed Huey Long and others. This activity is generally known today and would, if repeated, be unhealthful for those responsible for such un-American activity. If attempted again, it no doubt would start a number of this subversive gentry walking, and not having anyone to wave the staff and part the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans to provide escape, they might be forced to entrench themselves in Government-owned parks or else march to Mexico as guests of Papa Trotsky.

This I would not like to see, and it is my reason for suggesting that we now return to a republican form of government, restore State rights, take the government out of business, and restore constitutional rights to industry, commerce, business, and labor including all earning groups, as provided for in the Constitution of the United States. In returning to sound government, each and every one will be adequately protected, because in common unity each will respect the rights of the other.

The taxpayers of the United States set aside $100,000 to the Dies committee on un-American activities, and these taxpayers want the committee to find the "wolves in sheep's clothing."

The invisible government and those who own and control gold, money, and credit can squeeze the banks, if helping the community is not for the better interest of the invisible government. It is a power which has laid the country low many times, and it is the power in control today, of course in a different manner than before, because they now own and control all of the gold in the United States.

Before leaving the subject I want to say that "pinks," "reds," Socialists, Bundists, Fascists, and Communists would not dare to utter a word about their particular destructive activities, if the Government intelligence service had orders to clean them up. There is not one of these activities that could exist for any length of time if the Governmen chose to close down on them. The Constitution itself, in article III, section 3, classifies all unconstitutional activities as "treasonable" and those engaged in them "enemies of the United States." In view of this, it would be interesting to know what insults we shall tolerate before the Government takes it upon itself to drive these enemies of the people into their holes.

The Dies committee received $100,000 to investigate these activities, but have instead spent much of the time investigating those who believe in a republican form of government and who have taken upon themselves the responsibility to form shock units against the "red" invasion, after the Government has failed in doing its duty.

We have today in our midst many so-called antiforeign country societies, which go so far as to classify especially selected nations as enemies of the United States. The question now arises, What right has any group or society to classify any foreign nation as an enemy of all the United States? And what further right have they to say: "Do not trade with this nation"? Such attitude is not only provocative to war, but it is extremely silly from a commercial standpoint, because we shall need all the foreign trade we can get in such commodities as are not raised or produced in the United States.

The Dies committee should now call each and every member of these 700 "antiforeign nation" societies and ask them why they consider their particular pet aversion an enemy of the United States. It would be interesting to know their reason for such antagonism and hatreds, and I am sure in the discovery of that the Dies committee would be well on the trail of the Communist.

The Dies committee may be helped in its investigation of communism and un-American activities from an opinion expressed in a note, and an excerpt from an article that appeared in the Daily Worker, New York, Friday, May 19, 1939, both of which I now quote:

DEAR SIR: I wish to call your attention to this article which I am enclosing, Forward—the C. I. O.

If I say the Communists aid and assist and more or less control the C. I. O., then I am a "red batter"; if you make any such statement, you are a Fascist; but it must be so and O. K. to everybody when the chairman of the party says the Communists have par-ticipated and actively supported the C. I. O. in all their attempts

You might keep this on record or get it on record that the Communists themselves say they play an active part in C. I. O. organizations. It's their own story, not mine or yours.

From the Daily Worker:

On all these fronts against the capitalist offensive—the fight to prevent Martin and Gorman from splitting the auto and textile unions, the campaign to build up the steel union, the strikes of the miners and seamen, the organizing work in packing, agricultural implement, and fur, and the battle in defense of the Wagner Act—the Communists have actively participated and have loyally supported the C. I. O.'s efforts to build up a militant and powerful labor movement.

This information should be a revelation to the Dies committee, because communistic aid has been acknowledged by the C. I. O. and Mr. William Z. Foster, who, I believe, is the secretary of that organization.

In these examinations before the Dies committee the witnesses should not be compelled to face a battery of movingpicture machines or three or four cameras immediately in front of them, which is for no other purpose except a childish attempt at third-degree methods. These examinations are not supposed to be of the character of an inquisition. That age is no more. The investigation is to discover those engaged in un-American activities, and it is not for the purpose of intimidating those who testify to those activities. It strikes me that the committee has the "cart before the horse," and the examinations will finally terminate in finding out who the patriots are instead of discovering the enemies harbored in our midst. If the witness must have his picture taken, I am sure he would be glad to furnish the committee, as well as the newspapers, with one of his photographs. I am also reasonably sure that none of those whom I have heard testifying would refuse to submit to fingerprinting. That might be very interesting, because we could in some instances discover those with criminal records. No doubt many of those engaged in un-American activities belong to the criminal category and do have such records.

The Dies committee may further endeavor to find out why the F. B. I. is used for tracing down subscribers to magazines which can be bought at newsstands and subscribed to by every member of that Service. I often feel that someone believes that un-American activities are so widely distributed that our Intelligence Service is better employed to discover if there is anyone left who believes in a republican form of government.

After reading an account of Ambassador Bullitt's speech in the Times-Herald of May 29, and many other articles advocating war, I am rather inclined to favor a bill which will draft each and every one who speaks for war, whether through the press, magazines, or in any Government office, as shock troops in the first conflict. It would not hurt the Nation to get rid of them in an honorable manner. When we have reached the point where our own Ambassador speaks about the enslavement of the Nation, pretending that such enslavement will come from abroad, we no longer have an intelligent Ambassador. As a matter of fact, he does not know what it is all about. Enslavement of the American people will come from within, through the invisible government itself, and many of those who advocate war are agents of the invisible

In closing, I want everyone to know that I hold no animosity to anyone, no matter of what faith, creed, or race he may be. Everyone has a right to live and to share all happiness he can acquire legally, but no one has the right to deprive others of the rights he expects himself. Under a republican form of government, and particularly if we repeal the seventeenth amendment, our Nation will go on, stanch and safe. Let us all put our shoulders to the wheel and help our Nation back on the road to recovery. We have a duty to those who come after us. Let us in common decency leave their hands untied so that they may enjoy the blessing of liberty and the freedom that we have had under a government which was given to us by patriots who understood sound government better than we understand it today.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Delegate from Hawaii [Mr. KING]?

There was no objection.

OLD-AGE ASSISTANCE

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Rees]?

There was no objection.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have requested permission to address the House during the limited time allowed me, to call attention to a matter in which all the Members of the House, as well as the people of this country, are interested.

The Ways and Means Committee has passed to the House without recommendation a bill known as H. R. 6466, being a measure, according to its terms, which provides for a variable tax of from one-half percent to 2 percent on gross incomes, so that assistance may be rendered to the older people of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I have always been given to understand that we have a right to depend, to a great extent, upon the wise adjustment and experience of the important Ways and Means Committee, which I have understood, is the greatest committee in Congress. This committee, under the control of the majority party, is the most powerful committee of the House. It has been in session most of the time during the past 5 months. They say they have given 3 months of that time to consideration of amendments to the Social Security Act. They have held long hearings and taken a great deal of testimony covering various phases of this subject. Now they bring to the floor of the House, without recommendation, a bill which was in their hands for not more than 48 hours, and without having given it one iota of consideration. I am also informed by those of wide experience in Congress that bills of this nature, not bearing the recommendation of the Ways and Means Committee rarely are passed by the House.

This House is entitled to the judgment and consideration of the Ways and Means Committee. Why that committee has not held hearings on this particular measure, I do not know. Furthermore, they have not told us. I have observed from reading the newspapers that the bill is referred to as a "political hot potato."

It seems to me that it is only fair to the membership of this House and to the people interested in the measure—that the Ways and Means Committee should have held hearings on the bill and been ready to give the Members the benefit of those hearings. Certainly the membership of the House should have a right to offer amendments if they see fit to do so. Above all things, they should not call it a "hot potato" and tell us we must either vote it up or down in order to get rid of it.

Mr. Speaker, after the 5 months this Congress has been in session, this is the only legislation which the Ways and Means Committee has submitted to this House on the general question of Social Security. The Members of that committee should be prepared to answer some of the questions the Members of this House would like to ask them with reference to this bill when it comes to the floor of the House next Wednesday.

The bill, comprising 29 pages, was introduced last Tuesday, May 23. On Thursday, the Ways and Means Committee sends it to the House without recommendation. Then it goes before the Rules Committee, and today, we find that on next Wednesday, May 31, this bill which involves the great question of Social Security—a problem in which practically everybody is interested—is to be considered. It is to be given only 4 hours of debate for the 435 Members of the House. They tell us further that no Member will have a chance to offer amendments of any kind—but must either vote it up or down. I say to you that such action on the part of the Ways and Means Committee of this House is almost unprecedented, and in my judgment, is unfair to the sponsors of this measure as well as to the Members of Congress and the people they represent.

gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ANGELL]?
There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and include therein excerpts from a speech recently made by Dr. Joseph F. Thorning with regard to the Honorable Joseph B. Kennedy, United States Ambassador to Great Britain.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Engel] may have permission to address the House for 30 minutes on Thursday, June 1, at the conclusion of the legislative business of the day and following any special orders which may have heretofore been entered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

POSITION OF UNDER SECRETARY IN THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Mapes], who is the ranking member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—and as I understand the gentleman in turn has consulted with his colleagues of the minority on that committee—I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order to consider the bill S. 2314 at any time under the general rules of the House.

Mr. MAPES. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Texas says, I have consulted with a number of the Republican members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with regard to this request.

This is a bill which perhaps should be identified as a bill to create the position of Under Secretary in the Department of Commerce. The members of the committee, as far as I have consulted with them, do not object to this request, but it should be distinctly understood that they do object to the passage of the bill and desire adequate time to discuss the merits of the measure when it is called up.

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say to the gentleman that I will agree to any time the gentleman and the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] decide on.

Mr. MAPES. Granting this request in no way commits anybody in regard to the merits of the legislation.

Mr. RAYBURN. Not at all; that is not expected, of course. Mr. HOLMES. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman does not anticipate taking the bill up for consideration this week, anyway?

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say to the gentleman that it is the hope that at the completion of the consideration of the so-called Townsend plan the Committee on Ways and Means will be ready to present the amendments to the Social Security Act. If the committee have the amendments ready for presentation at that time, of course, we will go along with them. If they are not ready, then it would be the purpose of the gentleman from California to call this matter up on either Thursday or Friday. This bill, let me say to the House, as the gentleman from Michigan has stated, is a bill providing for the creation of the position of Under Secretary in the Department of Commerce.

Mr. WARREN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call this situation to the attention of the majority leader. The Select Committee on Government Reorganization hope to have a resolution reported Wednesday. I am sure it will be something to which there will be no objection whatever and its consideration may require 25 or 30 minutes. I am sure the minority will agree to it. We consider it very necessary and vital that this resolution be brought up for consideration as soon as the Townsend measure is disposed of. I hope the majority leader will take that into consideration before definitely saying that another bill will be taken up at that time.

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say to the gentleman from North Carolina that this is the first I have heard that that committee may want to report any sort of a resolution this week. I have discussed the program with the chairman of the Ccmmittee on Ways and Means. In making up the program, of course, I cannot consider matters that have not been called to my attention.

Mr. WARREN. The only reason it was not called to the attention of the gentleman is that we did not know until today, but I do not believe the consideration of the resolution will require more than 30 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say to the gentleman that that is very appealing, but I will have to talk to these other gentlemen before I make any agreement.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, for the moment I object.

The SPEAKER. Did the Chair understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to object?

Mr. HOLMES. I object, Mr. Speaker, until there is some understanding as to the time the bill will be called up.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that today, at the conclusion of the business on the Speaker's table and following the special order for which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Crawford] will submit a request in a moment, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FITZFATRICK, for an indefinite period, on account of illness.

To Mr. Maciejewski, for an indefinite period, on account of illness.

To Mr. Ashbrook, for the remainder of the week, on account of important business.

FEDERAL SUGAR POLICY

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan renew his request for permission to address the House?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 25 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, on last Monday, May 22, the majority leader, the Honorable Samuel Rayburn, of Texas, asked me several questions with respect to the Federal sugar policy. He particularly requested me to explain what is the cost of the domestic sugar industry to the consumers of the United States.

The Sugar Act and future sugar legislation have been currently very live subjects in both branches of Congress. I am pleased to note that the majority leader is sufficiently interested to ask questions about the policies that are now being applied by the United States Government in regard to sugar. In response to the request of the gentleman from Texas, I have prepared as complete and comprehensive a statement on the facts as I am able to do within a limited space and time.

At the outset I want to repeat the answer which I gave to the gentleman from Texas on Monday when he asked how much sugar should be produced by the southern cane- and the beet-sugar producing States. I claim that the American sugar-beet growers and the American sugarcane growers, including the growers of Hawaii and Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, should first be allowed to grow all of the sugar that they can supply to our market. Whatever balance is left and needed to supply our consumptive demands should go to Cuba and the Philippine Islands. I further stated, and here repeat, that as long as our own farmers can grow sugar beets and sugarcane so that the cost of sugar at retail to the consumers in the United States will not exceed the going average retail price of sugar paid in all of the countries of the world, they should be permitted to do so, and I advocate that they be encouraged to do so as a matter of good national

Before I discuss the cost of supporting the domestic sugar industry, let me say to the Members of the House of Representatives that the payments which are being made to growers of sugar beets and sugarcane are financed by the sugar industry itself. The tax which the producers of sugar pay has been entirely absorbed by the sugar industry. I make that statement for the reason that the average prices paid at retail for sugar in the United States during the years 1935, 1936, and 1937 were one-half cent higher than the price which is now being paid by the consumers of sugar, despite the fact that a tax of one-half cent per pound was placed upon sugar in September 1937. At the time that this tax was placed upon sugar the American consumer was paying an average of 5.6 cents per pound, where in 1939 he is paying 5.1 cents per pound. If the consumers were being charged the same price for sugar as they paid in 1935, 1936, and 1937, plus the tax, the price of sugar today would average over 6 cents instead of 5.1 cents. Now, this price is not mere chance, because the Secretary of Agriculture is applying a throttling control upon the price of sugar which is causing distress in every area which sells sugar in the United States market, including Cuba.

On several occasions during the past 2 or 3 years prominent officials of the national administration have repeated the statement, "American consumers are obliged to pay more than $350,000,000 per annum in excess of the value at world prices for their annual sugar supply." These statements appear in the official record of public hearings and congressional deliberations. One important Government official called it a "rake-off" for the domestic sugar industry. Last Monday the majority leader asked me whether this figure is correct; and if not, what is the actual cost of protecting the sugar industry of the United States. This figure of $350,000,-000, which purports to represent the cost of what the American consumer pays for the protection given the domestic sugar industry, was originally based upon the difference between the price in the United States market during 1936 and the price at which a very small part of the world sugar supply, which sells under extremely distressed conditions, moved in the free market. Moreover, this figure was computed at a time when the domestic prices exceeded the free-market prices by a very much larger amount than at present. In fact, if the same method of computing were used for determining the difference between domestic prices and free-market prices during 1937 and 1938, the result for each year would be far less than $350,000,000. But in no case would the total figure represent the actual costs or even possible costs.

I shall show that the method used in arriving at this tremendous figure—which is obviously intended to scare the consumer—is based upon exaggerated imagination and represents a result which is impossible to occur as a matter of practice. As I stated before, it is a purely hypothetical computation which becomes an intellectually dishonest presentation of the facts.

Let us take the figure for 1938, which would be derived by subtracting the consumption and domestic prices, including the tax on sugar, from the free-market prices—after multiplying each by the tonnage of sugar consumed in 1938—as follows:

6,666,694 tons, at $62.72 per ton equals______$458,000,000 6,666,694 tons at $22.80 per ton equals______ 152,000,000

Difference______ 306, 000, 000

But the figure $306,000,000 is entirely meaningless, because none of the producers who presently supply the United States market with sugar could long sell sugar on the basis of $22.80 per ton, as that is less than their cost of production.

I use the term "free market" instead of "world market," because the latter term is a complete misnomer. The free market is where the price of sugar does not include a tariff duty or tax. Members of Congress naturally believe that the "world price" means the price paid by consumers for sugar all over the world, but every sugar statistician or economist or person engaged in producing or marketing sugar knows that this so-called "world price" is actually the free-market price on raw sugar and the so-called "world market" is where a very small part of the world supply of raw sugar is dumped. For instance, Cuba sells almost onethird of its sugar on the free market. Now any Cuban sugar producer will admit that he is losing money on such sales, but he makes up for those losses by the fact that Cuba sells annually to the United States 2,000,000 tons or more of sugar, for which the Cubans receive a very much better price as a result of the preference in tariff which Cuba enjoys.

There is one point which should be made plain to every man and woman who really want to understand the sugar problem from the standpoint of the interest of the consumer. It appears to be the preference of those who seek to inflame the consumer regarding the alleged cost of the domestic sugar industry, to use as the basis of discussion what they call the "world price." First, let me say that this price is not paid by any consumer in any country. This price is not what anyone pays for the white sugar which is consumed at the dining-room table or in the kitchen of the consumer. This so-called "world price" is a price paid for raw sugar which has to be refined before it is fit for direct human consumption. Furthermore, this so-called "world price" is not the price paid for all raw sugar throughout the world, but it is a price paid in the tariff-free markets of the world. where less than 10 percent of the world supply of sugar is sold. Manifestly, any computation cannot be accurate which seeks to demonstrate the cost of sugar to the United States consumer by taking as its basis a market where less than 10 percent of the sugar is sold, and where even that sugar is distressed and is the subject of export dumping.

As a matter of fact, the figures of the United States Department of Commerce officially issued show that the average price paid for sugar in all of the countries of the world as of May 1938, is much higher than the price paid by consumers at retail in the United States. The price paid for sugar at retail in each of the principal countries of the world is much higher than the price paid in the United States. Stated differently, all of the countries that have large populations are paying more for their sugar at retail than is being paid in the United States by consumers. The only exception is England where the bounties paid to the sugar producers come out of the Treasury to which the consumers contribute in the form of taxes other than a tax on sugar.

The United States Department of Commerce has very recently issued a booklet entitled "Sugar Retail Prices in 43 Countries." The information therein contained has been compiled in the Foodstuffs Division of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce from reports submitted from the Foreign Service offices of the Departments of State and of Commerce. Therefore it is authentic and official.

Two statements contained in this document, when taken together, have a peculiar significance for us just at the present time:

Although the average world price of raw sugar during the month of April 1936, 1937, and 1938, respectively, averaged approximately 1.06, 1.36, and 1.05 cents per pound, the price remained unchanged. In 34 out of a total of 43 countries the retail price either remained the same or increased as cf May 1, 1938, compared to May 1, 1937.

These statements, officially made, demonstrate better than any argument I could possibly advance the fallacy of using the so-called world price of raw sugar as the basis of discussing the consumer angle of the sugar business. The world price of raw sugar fell 23 percent, or from an average of 1.36 cents per pound during April 1937 to 1.05 cents in April 1938, and yet the retail price paid by consumers in 34 out of 43 countries either remained the same or actually increased.

I ask to have printed as part of my remarks the complete table 6 of the report of the United States Department of Commerce in order to present the full picture to the Members

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HARE). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

5 The countries included in this table are those which import the major part of their sugar requirements. Excise taxes are included in the table when applicable and are explained in the notes. For uniformity the rates of duty cited in the above table are in each case the highest rate payable, although a considerable portion of imports into some of these countries are derived from sugar-producing areas which stand in special relation to them and enjoy reduced rates of duty on sugar, viz:

Import duty on refined sugar as of May 1, 1938, in United States cents per pound

527 or , 256 d. mandates)______Canada: British preference_____

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, analyzing further, I find that only such exporting countries as Brazil, Cuba, Peru, Philippine Islands, Netherlands Indies, self-supplying Costa Rica, Ecuador, Guatemala, and India have lower cost to the consumer. Taken collectively, these countries do not have a population comparable to the larger nations of the world. By contrast, Italians pay 15.73 cents, Germans pay 13.67 cents, the French pay 7.16 cents, and even the Chinese pay 5.65

As this compilation was made as of date May 1, 1938, the retail price in the United States appears as 5.40 cents. But since that time the retail price of sugar in the United States went down until it had reached an average of 5.10 cents in March 1939, which is the latest official published report.

The following questions must be answered in order to get an intelligent understanding of the problem of sugar pro-

First. How representative of the price at which the United States could obtain its sugar supply on a free-market basis are the prices now prevailing in the free market?

Second. How much is the domestic sugar supply now costing in excess of what it could be bought in the free market?

Third. To what extent does this excess amount now go to increase the income to the producers of domestic sugar crops, and to what extent does it go to further other national policies?

Fourth. To what extent do other considerations offset the domestic consumer's burden from protection to domestic producers?

Fifth. To what extent is the income of domestic sugar producers increased by this protection?

Sixth. What uses are made of the protection?

1. A TREMENDOUS RISE IN FREE-MARKET PRICES WOULD RESULT IF THE UNITED STATES ATTEMPTED TO BUY ITS SUGAR IN THE FREE MARKET

The assumption upon which the $306,000,000 figure is based! is that, without any restrictions upon sugar entering the United States, this country could obtain its entire sugar supply at a price of approximately 1 cent per pound. The reason that this extremely low price prevails in the free sugar market to the extent that it does is that certain areas overexpanded their production in the 1920's, and this is the play of economic factors necessary to return them to their normal level of output.

² Although import duties form a varying but, in many instance, important part of retail price, only excise duties are included for the countries classified as self-supplying. Import duties shown in footnote, table 4.

In fact, though on a greatly restricted basis, the cost of production in Cuba, our principal source of sugar outside of domestic areas, is about 2 cents per pound. Cuba is also the largest seller in the world market. Cuba can sell some sugar at the present free-market price because she is able to obtain a much higher price for her sugar sold in the United States market, and consequently can take a loss on the sugar sold in the free market and still average out at a price which enables her to stay in production.

Less than 10 percent of the world sugar output sells in the free market, and most of this is from areas that sell part of their output at higher prices, as does Cuba.

The quantity of sugar now sold by all world areas in the free market is less than one-half of the United States annual consumption. Even allowing a reasonable period for the adjustment of economic factors, this quantity of sugar would not be trebled unless prices were substantially in excess of present free-market levels.

The price at which the United States could obtain its entire sugar supply if bought in the free market would be from two to three times the price level now prevailing. For the United States to buy its entire requirements in the free market would mean that production in the areas supplying such market would have to again reach or exceed the all-time record high level of production in such areas which was reached in the late 1920's after a decade in which free-market prices for raw sugar were as high as 19 cents per pound, and averaged 4.1 cents, as compared to 1.14 cents for 1938.

 DIFFERENCE BETWEEN VALUE OF UNITED STATES SUGAR REQUIREMENTS AT DOMESTIC PRICE AND AT PRICE AT WHICH THIS SUGAR COULD BE EOUGHT IN FREE MARKET NEAR $125,000,000

Even if all domestic sugar requirements could be obtained in the free market at a price as low as 2.5 cents per pound, which is substantially less than the prices which last brought forth the level of production in the areas in such market necessary to supply present free-market and United States requirements combined, the cost to the consumer of restrictive measures upon sugar is about $125,000,000, and nowhere near the figure of $350,000,000 frequently used.

This $125,000,000 figure is based upon the quantity of sugar consumed in 1938, domestic prices, including the tax, and the lowest price at which the domestic supply most likely could be bought in the free market. The quantity of sugar consumed in the United States in 1938, by sources, and the amount this sugar cost the consumer over and above the price at which it probably could have been bought for in the free market, are as follows:

Source of sugar	Quantity consumed from stated sources in 1938, short tons, raw value	Value at do- mestic price, including the tax of 0.5 cent (3.44 cents per pound, raw value)	Value at lowest price at which supply probably could be bought in free market (2.5 cents per pound, raw value)	Difference be- tween values at domestic and probable free-market prices
Domestic areas Philippine Islands. Foreign areas	3, 691, 865 958, 851 2, 015, 978	$254, 000, 000 66, 000, 000 138, 000, 000	$185, 000, 000 48, 000, 000 100, 000, 000	$69, 900, 000 18, 000, 000 38, 000, 000
Total	6, 666, 694	458, 000, 000	333, 000, 000	125, 000, 000

A careful and scientific statistical analysis of both domestic and world supply and demand conditions indicates that 2.5 cents per pound is the lowest price at which the United States could expect to buy its sugar supply in the free market.

3. LARGE PART OF $125,000,000 BURDEN ON CONSUMER GOES TO FURTHER OTHER NATIONAL POLICIES AND NOT TO INCREASE INCOME OF SUGAR PRODUCERS

A large part of this probable $125,000,000, representing the difference between the values of United States sugar requirements at domestic prices and at the price at which our sugar supply could probably be obtained in the free market, goes to further other policies of our National Government, and does not go to the sugar producers. In the first place, the $38,000,000, representing the difference in the value of foreign sugar consumed in this country at 2.5 cents and at domestic prices, goes to the Federal Treasury to help cover general Treasury operations. In the second place, the $18,000,000 of similar origin goes to the Philippine Islands to enable those islands to adjust their economy to conditions subsequent to independence. Thus, $56,000,000 of the probable $125,000,000 cost of our sugar supply over and above the value at which it could be bought in free markets goes to support the general cost of the Government or to promote national policies which are in no way to the interest of domestic sugar producers. Though the $69,000,000 arising from the difference between domestic and probable free market prices on the quantity of sugar consumed from domestic areas goes to the domestic producer, the $56,000,000 that goes to support other national policies cannot be charged as a benefit to the producer. In fact, this $56,000,000 is a burden on the sugar consumer in the same sense that a tax on cigarets is a burden on the cigaret consumer, but is no more a benefit to the sugar producer than the tax on cigarets is a benefit to the tobacco producer. The truth is that, if the sole purpose was to protect the domestic sugar producer, this $56,000,000, or possibly more, could be saved for the consumer, and the producer still receive the same protection he now receives.

4. CONSUMER DOES NOT LOSE BUT GAINS FROM $69,000,000 DOMESTIC PRODUCERS RECEIVE IN PROTECTION

Now, using the formula of $125,000,000 difference between the value of our domestic sugar supply at 2.5 cents and the domestic price, and with $56,000,000 of this amount going to further other national policies, we must conclude the cost to the consumer of protection to domestic producers is only $69,000,000. Furthermore, however, the consumer receives other benefits which offset a large part, if not all, of this $69,000,000 burden. In most cases the consumer gets his purchasing power by engaging in some productive activity. To the extent that the outlet for the goods he produces is increased, the consumer receives offsetting benefits from the $69,000,000 burden.

The record of domestic sugar producers as a market for goods produced by other sections of the Nation shows that for each 100 pounds of sugar they sell, with prices as they were in 1938, they buy in return about $3.20 in domestic goods. On the other hand, the market records of foreign areas supplying this market large quantities of sugar indicates that, with a price of $2.50 per hundred pounds of sugar, they would buy in return only $1.83 of goods. Bearing in mind that the domestic-sugar consumer gets his purchasing power from some productive activity, the consumer, therefore, obtains a market for approximately $100,000,000 more goods by reason of his $69,000,000 burden than he would enjoy if our entire domestic sugar requirements were bought from foreign producers. The consumer, therefore, gains instead of loses from the protection accorded domestic sugar producers. I wish to say to Mr. RAYBURN this is a categorical answer to your question.

5. SIXTY-NINE MILLION DOLLARS PROTECTION RECEIVED BY DOMESTIC PRODUCERS INCREASES FARM INCOME MORE THAN $200,000,000

The $69,000,000 protection accorded to the domestic sugar producer enables him to produce a much larger volume of sugar crops than he would be able to produce without such protection. It is variously estimated that domestic-sugar producers would produce only about 1,000,000 tons of sugar if the price were 2.5 cents per pound. The domestic farmer receives a net gain of $204,000,000 in income resulting from the $69,000,000 burden to the domestic sugar consumer.

This $204,000,000 figure is obtained from the quantity of sugar consumed from domestic areas in 1938 with the prices, including the tax, that prevailed and from the quantity of sugar domestic areas probably would produce with a price at 2.5 cents per pound. It is derived as follows:

3,691,865 tons, at $68.72 per ton______$254,000,000 1,000,000 tons, at $50 per ton_______50,000,000

Difference 204, 000, 000

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan. Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Unfortunately, I have not heard all of the gentleman's remarks, but I hope somewhere in his remarks he has incorporated the cost to the American consumer which has always appeared whenever there has not been enough of the domestic sugar on the market to constitute genuine competition with the foreign sugar.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

6. PROTECTION ENABLES DOMESTIC PRODUCERS TO PAY AMERICAN WAGES AND TAXES AND TO MAINTAIN THEIR SOIL FERTILITY

The protection received by domestic sugar producers enables them to pay higher wages and taxes than do the foreign producers that sell in the free market. The most recent data in this connection are those compiled by the United States Tariff Commission for the years 1929-30 to 1931-32, inclusive. These data show that the wages paid in growing and harvesting cane averaged $2.14 per ton of cane in Louisiana, Puerto Rico, and Hawaii, but only 89 cents in Cuba. The amount paid in taxes averaged 27 cents per ton in the three domestic areas but only 2 cents per ton in Cuba. Under the system of production followed for the most part in Cuba, the soil is used for cane until it is exhausted, and then it is abandoned. In domestic areas good farming practices, the use of fertilizer and the like are followed to conserve and maintain the soil. The Tariff Commission found that the three domestic areas used 64 cents worth of fertilizer per ton of cane but that Cuba used none. These three items of cost alone more than take up the real protection enjoyed by domestic producers.

By way of summary, we conclude the burden on the consumer of sugar for the benefit of the domestic grower of sugar crops is only about $69,000,000 and not $306,000,000 or the $350,000,000 frequently stated. The grower, while receiving only $69,000,000 in actual protection—that is, protection over and above the price at which our domestic supply might be obtained in the free market—is given an increase of about $204,000,000 in income. This increase in income goes not to a few persons but to thousands of farmers, factory and other laborers to support the Government, to cover expenses incurred in conserving and maintaining the fertility of the soil in order that our posterity may make a living thereon, and to pay for other items needed by sugar producers and laborers, the price of which is increased by other protective measures.

It is difficult to see, therefore, how it can be contrary to any sound national policy or would not be in the interest of national welfare to exchange $69,000,000 for $204,000,000. It is even more difficult to see why this should not be done when it is considered that the purchasing power of the consumer is increased by reason of larger domestic purchases of goods made in this country by an amount greater than the burden which is placed upon such consumer.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and to include therein a statement made by Secretary Morgenthau last Saturday before the Ways and Means Committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

TO CREATE AN EDMUND BURKE MEMORIAL COMMISSION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobbs] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, it is a historic saying that democracies are ungrateful. Ingratitude—one of the basest of base vices—cannot be laid to the charge of our American democracy, which is the exception to that rule. The United States, with ennobling spirit and exquisite art, has honored the benefactors and saviors of human freedom. Witness our Washington Monument, our Lincoln Memorial, the Thomas Jefferson Memorial now being erected. Witness the memorial decreed by an act of the Congress to preserve in grateful memory the services of Lafayette to our Nation when coming to birth. Witness the statues in honor of William Pitt, erected by the New York Colony and by the South Carolina Colony, after the repeal of the Stamp Act, and to hundreds of others worthy of honor. The publication of the writings of Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, also attest our gratitude and the value we place on thus making available to the thinkers of earth the riches of their wisdom.

Yet one memorial remains to complete this meed of gratitude and praise which already adorns the annals of our country—a just and appropriate memorial in honor of Edmund Burke, whose resplendent genius and world-wide fame achieved supreme glory in his defense of the American Colonies during their contest with the mother country for English rights and equal justice under law. In praise of Edmund Burke's writings on America, Lord Morley says with insight and truth:

If ever in the fullness of time—and surely the fates of men and literature cannot have it otherwise—Burke becomes one of the half dozen names of established and universal currency in education and in common books, rising above the waywardness of literary caprice or intellectual fashions, as Shakespeare and Milton and Bacon rise above it, it will be the mastery, the elevation, the wisdom of these far-shining discourses in which the world will in an especial degree recognize the combination of sovereign gifts with beneficent uses.

After more than 150 years the fullness of time is come: and the name of Edmund Burke is securely written with the names of Shakespeare, Milton, and Bacon-with the name of our Washington. George Washington and Edmund Burke were one in spirit and in truth. Edmund Burke fought for human freedom on the battlefields of the human spirit. George Washington fought the same good fight on the sacred soil which Almighty God had given to the chosen sons of England. They were beautiful in their lives and in their death they are not divided. They share together an immortality of fame. It was Edmund Burke who foretold the fame of Washington, prophesying that his character would be transmitted to posterity among the first of heroes and patriots. It is the reasoned verdict of history, that without Edmund Burke in Parliament and George Washington at Valley Forge and Yorktown, and thereafter in councils as potent, there would be no United States of America. England has finely honored George Washington. Shall not cur America in like spirit honor Edmund Burke?

Now, therefore, let the spirit of Washington speak to this Seventy-sixth Congress of the United States with a moving appeal to create an Edmund Burke memorial commission, with an appropriation adequate to perpetuate Burke's shining fame and commensurate with his services to the American Colonies and to this great Nation, established by the wisdom of Edmund Burke and the leadership of George Washington. Such a memorial of gratitude and good will at this critical and auspicious time in the history of English-speaking peoples, who seek to preserve human freedom on earth, is now proposed in a petition to the President and the Congress of the United States by more than 150 leaders of American thought, whose names appear in the preamble of a resolution I have introduced today.

Dr. Hopson Owen Murfee, of Alabama, is the distinguished scholar and educator who conceived the idea of such a memorial, and is leading the effort to make his dream a reality.

The American memorial edition of the complete writings of Edmund Burke would preserve and make available to American States and legislatures, to American colleges and universities, and to the English-speaking peoples throughout the world a definite edition of the complete writings of the greatest of English statesmen and the most justly famous Englishman of letters who, with truth, is praised by competent judges as the Shakespeare of English prose, the Sir Isaiac Newton of English politics, the George Washington among English statesmen. Ireland, England, India, France, and the entire Christian world are beneficiaries with America of the genius and wisdom of Edmund Burke, dedicated to the cause of representative constitutional government, human freedom, religious liberty, Christian morals, and equal justice under law. Such an act of Congress would unite more securely our English-speaking peoples, would advance the cause of representative constitutional government, safeguard human freedom, religious liberty, and peace and justice among men and nations.

Of course, we know that there have been 35 "collections" of the works of Edmund Burke. Some are quite inclusive and of great value. But it is thought that none of them are definitive. The fullness of his genius can only be seen and made usable by such an edition as is now proposed.

Let us now highly resolve that by the adoption of this resolution we shall in this auspicious year of the visit of the King and Queen of Great Britain to the nation so dearly cherished and so nobly served by Edmund Burke achieve a memorial commensurate with the vision of the American Ambassador to Great Britain, Whitelaw Reid, in his eloquent eulogy, Our Foremost Friend in Great Britain, delivered at the unveiling of a tablet in memory of Edmund Burke at Bath, England, October 22, 1908. The words of our American Ambassador are in part these:

The occasion which you are honoring with your presence today is of a kind long since familiar to you. What a story of the great Georgian and Victorian times might in fact be reconstructed from the tablets in memory of former residents, which you have already set up in the streets of Bath! Your town has been a haunt of men; the very air is filled yet with the shadows of the mighty. Foremost in your civic record comes naturally your old member, the masterful Chatham, and hard after his yet more masterful son. the masterful Chatham, and hard after his yet more masterful son. Then you have commemorated the stay among you of Britain's greatest sailor, Lord Nelson, and of British soldiers who won imperishable renown in two remote continents, Lord Clive in Asia, General Wolfe in America. You have cherished, likewise, the memories of residents of gentler fame. Here on this very North Parade, as your tablets show, dwelt Goldsmith, whom to this day all men love, and Wordsworth, whom all admire. On the South Parade is seen your tribute to the best novelist Britain had to that time produced Sir Walter Scott, and there is a place for another to one men love, and Wordsworth, whom all admire. On the South Parade is seen your tribute to the best novelist Britain had to that time produced, Sir Walter Scott, and there is a place for another to one of the greatest men of letters she ever produced, Samuel Johnson. Your other novelists range from Henry Fielding and Jane Austin to Charles Dickens; and your poets from George Crabbe to Thomas Moore and Walter Savage Landor; while, with impartial hands, you have placed tablets also to Gainsborough, the artist; Quin, the actor; and Herschell, the astronomer.

And yet, gentlemen of Bath, in all this brilliant galaxy you have left the greatest to the last. He was more nearly your own, too, than many of the others. It was here he found his devoted wife. Perhaps the most fruitful period of his great public career he spent as the representative in the House of Commons for your nearest neighbors, the people of Bristol. Here he came repeatedly for rest and enjoyment; and here he came, too, when he knew the shadow of death was upon him. In this very house he spent the last months in which any activity was left him, and he only quitted it for the serene and beautiful death bed at Beaconsfield.

Did I go too far in rating him the greatest you have yet commemorated? It is not so far as Macaulay went. He said quite simply that Edmund Burke was "the greatest man then living." We may be sure the eminent historian and almost omniscient scholar and critic forgot neither of two other great men then living.

We may be sure the eminent historian and almost omniscient scholar and critic forgot neither of two other great men then living, William Pitt or Charles James Fox, when he deliberately chose that superlative. It is not so far as Grenvile went, when he said that Burke is to politics what Shakespeare is to the moral world. In considering that eulogium, however, I must confess that, while recognizing the propriety of coupling the names, I have often been purelled to know whether Grenville meant that relities had not recognizing the propriety of coupling the names, I have often been puzzled to know whether Grenville meant that politics had nothing to do with morals, or merely that Shakespeare had nothing to do with politics. It is not so far as Mackintosh went, who considered Burke "without a parallel in any age or country, unless with Cicero and Lord Bacon"; or so far as Lord Morley went, who, seeking another standard of comparison, pronounced him your "greatest man since Milton."

There is an estimate in another place by this last accomplished statesman and man of letters, which I would like to quote. He said that Burke's "is one of the greatest names in the history of political literature. No one that ever lived used the general ideas of the thinker more successfully to judge the particular problems of the statesman. He was one of the great masters of the high and difficult art of elaborate composition."

And yet, what could be terser, what could go more directly like an arrow to the heart of the matter in hand, than many of the epigrammatic sentences which sprinkle almost every page of his speeches? Take a very familiar example: "It looks to me narrow and pedantic to apply the ordinary ideas of criminal justice to this great public contest. I do not know the method of drawing up an indictment against a whole people." Has any recent orator, free from the alleged fault of too much rhetoric, condensed into fewer indictment against a whole people." Has any recent orator, free from the alleged fault of too much rhetoric, condensed into fewer and more cogent words the argument against a historic error in the statesmanship of more than one land? Or take another example: "Gentlemen say America is an object well worth fighting for. Certainly it is, if fighting a people be the best way of gaining them." Or again, "Nobody shall persuade me, when a whole people are concerned, that acts of lenity are not means of conciliation." Or again, take the pregnant sentence into which he put the whole philosophy of his opposition to the French Revolution: "Whenever a separation is made between liberty and justice, neither is in my opinion safe." Or again, take his whimsical expression of his distilke for the employment of Hasting and its like for the employment of Hasting and in the same content of the state of the same content. opinion safe." Or again, take his whimsical expression of his dis-like for the employment of Hessian soldiers against English colonists: "I fairly acknowledge I have not yet learned to delight in finding Fort Kniphausen in the heart of the British Dominions." Or again, his candid estimate of the success these Hessian soldiers gained: "You have the ground they encamp on, and you have no more." Or again, in resisting the reactionary tendencies which would have carried the rule of George III back to the standard of Charles I: "The people of England were then, as they are now, called upon to make government strong. They thought it a great deal better to make it wise and honest." Or, to take a final example, what could better expose the imbeclity of the proposal to treat privateering as piracy, and service in the Colonial Army as treason, and to enforce against both, where opportunity offered the penalties in the statute of Henry VIII, than his scornful phrase: "They think the defeats in America can be compensated by the triumphs of Tyburn."

If illuminating flashes like these are a fault in political discussion, they are at least a fault not too common among the public men of our day. Would that more debates were "too common among the public men of our day. Would that more debates were "too ornate and rhetorical" after this convincing fashion—I will not say in your Parliament, for it would be unbecoming in me to express any opinion about that; but perhaps I may venture to say, would that there were more of them in our Houses of Congress.

Mr. Burke illustrated conspicuously in this very neighborhood another quality ret too.

another quality not too common among our public men—however, it may be with yours. He scorned to pander to the prejudices of his constituents, or bow to every gust of changing opinion in order to hold their votes. Even when first a candidate in Bristol he took pains to make it clear that he would not recognize their he took pains to make it clear that he would not recognize their instructions as always binding his action. "Your representative owes you," he exclaimed, "not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays, instead of serving you, if he sacrifices that to your opinion." Later, when his attitude had excited discontent, he told them if they did not permit their member to act upon a very enlarged view of things, they would at length infallibly degrade their national representation into a confused and scuffling bustle of local agency. He knew efforts had been made to injure him in their eyes, but "the use of character is to be a shield against calumny." "I could not have served you as I have done," he proudly added to the electors, "and court you, too. I canvassed you through your affairs and not your persons. You must look to the whole tenor of your member's conduct."

It proved in the end too much to hope for, even in a city like

It proved in the end too much to hope for, even in a city like ristol and with a man like Burke. Yet Bristol may well be It proved in the end too much to hope for, even in a city like Bristol and with a man like Burke. Yet Bristol may well be proud of the wisdom that chose Burke as its representative during that part of his public service which time has most thoroughly vindicated, and can join with us in admiring the fine and calm dignity with which he accepted his ultimate dismissal. He rejoiced that the justice of his course whether as to Ireland or America was no longer in doubt. "No," he exclaimed, "the charges against me are all of one kind, that I pushed the principles of general justice and benevolence too far, further than a cautious policy would warrant, and further than the opinions of many would go along with me. In every accident which may happen through policy would warrant, and further than the opinions of many would go along with me. In every accident which may happen through life, in pain, in sorrow, in depression, and distress, I will call to my mind this accusation and be comforted." If his lofty shade takes any cognizance now of human affairs, he may read what these communities themselves think of that accusation in the Bristol statue and the Bath tablet.

No other men in England, hardly one even in America, saw quite No other then in England, hardly one even in America, saw quite so clearly as Edmund Burke that after an unwise ministry has forced the Colonists into a long war in defense of the English principle of no taxation without representation, the only possible outcome of the war by which the real England could succeed would outcome of the war by which the real England could succeed would be an American victory. Yet no other deprecated the struggle so much; no other at the outset more sincerely desired to preserve the authority of Parliament and the just rights of the crown. He even admitted the precedents, both on these islands and in the colonies, for taxation without representation. But when once the right was determinedly challenged, he frankly recognized that, as he put it in lawyerlike phrase, "the assertion of the title would be the loss of the suit."

While there was still a chance to draw back, he pleaded with the Ministry and with Parliament: "It is our business to rule, not to wrangle. It is poor compensation to triumph in a dispute, whilst we lose an empire." "Your ancestors." he exclaimed, "did at length open their eyes to the ill-husbandry of injustice. They found that the tyranny of a free people could of all tyrannies the least be endured." And then he reminded the Ministry that, while reciting the entire and perfect authority of the Crown, its predecessors had nevertheless, with the approval of the Crown, given successively to various English communities and also to the Welsh all the rights and privileges of English subjects. "Are not the Colonists," he demanded, "as much Englishmen as the Welsh?" By such steps he came to regard the struggle as not a rebellion, but a civil war, in which Englishmen in the Colonies fought for old English rights, and in gaining these rights for themselves made English rights, and in gaining these rights for themselves made them henceforth forever secure for England, too.

them henceforth forever secure for England, too.

In fact, upon this common English heritage he grounded his appeals: "This fierce spirit of liberty," he told Parliament, "is stronger in the English Colonies, probably, than in any other people of the earth. They are not only devoted to liberty, but to liberty according to English ideas and on English principles." And again, "We cannot falsify, I fear, the pedigree of this fierce people, and persuade them that they are not sprung from a nation in whose veins the blood of freedom circulates. The language in which they would hear you tell them this tale would detect the imposition; your speech would betray you. An Englishman is the unfittest person on earth to argue another Englishman into slavery." He made his plea unanswerable by grounding it upon undisputed historical facts: "The feelings of the Colonies were formerly the feelings of Great Britain. They were formerly the feelings of Mr. Hampden, when called upon for the payment of 20 shillings." And later on in the discussion he uttered the prophetic warning, "English colonies must be had on these terms or not had at all."

What Mr. Burke constantly sought, in the American business, what Mr. Burke constantly sought, in the American business, while it was possible, was reconciliation. His most important utterance during the long debate, from the Stamp Act to the Declaration of Independence, was entitled "Conciliation with America," and English oratory contains no more powerful or persuasive plea for peace. A month after the momentous declaration, he wrote: "We are deep in blood. God knows how it will be. I do not see how I can wish success to those whose victory is to separate from us a large and noble part of our empire; still less do I wish success to injustice, oppression, and absurdity."

This sheer mental inability to support injustice was the key to his whole conduct in American affairs—to his whole conduct, indeed in every public affair. It is this which makes his discussions of old eighteenth-century issues a vivid and vital part of the English old eighteenth-century issues a vivid and vital part of the English literature you still cherish in the twentieth century. Their great value was and is that he constantly looked to enduring principles for light on current problems. That was the crowning trait in the wonderful equipment which made him the greatest orator of his country, and its most splendid writer on public affairs—the only man, as a critic of the day said, who had combined the two qualities in like perfection since Cicero. Such rank he won, by contemporary judgment and by that of posterity, in an epoch of great men and great deeds—the greatest, as Lord Rosebery has somewhere observed, in the history of the world up to that time, since the coming of Christ. the coming of Christ.

I have only one thing to add. The colonists whom Burke be-friended were, after all, but a feeble folk, less than 3,000,000, scat-tered along the eastern fringe of a continent with the ocean on one hand and a savage wilderness on the other. They have since subdued the wilderness, overspread the continent, and stretched out in either hemisphere to the islands of the sea. I am here on Burke's threshold to utter the voice, feebly and inadequately, it may be, but the authentic voice of that people of now nearly 90,-000,000 souls in reverent and affectionate gratitude for the memory, the undying memory of their foremost friend in Great Britain.

Thus spoke the United States Ambassador to Great Britain in 1908.

Now, in the fullness of time, "in reverent and affectionate gratitude for the memory, the undying memory of their foremost friend in Great Britain," let this Seventy-sixth Congress achieve in this proposed American memorial to Edmund Burke a larger and more enduring monument to the fame of Edmund Burke than the Bath Tablet, the Dublin Statue, and the statue in Westminster Abbey. The grateful hearts of the American people consecrate and keep the true memorial of his immortality.

PENSIONS FOR DISABLED REGULARS

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to preceed for 1 minute and to extend my remarks in the RECORD. The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HARE). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, there is pending before the Congress S. 522 and H. R. 5452, which, if enacted into law, would provide a more decent pension for disabled regulars. Those bills are entitled to careful consideration by our membership. The unfortunate tragedy which sent 26 American heroes to a watery grave when the submarine Squalus sank off Portsmouth, N. H., brings vividly to our attention the need of such legislation.

The highly mechanized instrumentalities of warfare which we have today place an ever-increasing hazard upon our soldiers and sailors who are engaged in protecting our country. May we not take a lesson from the sacrifice of these young American lives in the performance of their hazardous duty on this ill-fated submarine? Let us remember that if they and others in like service of defense for their country become disabled or die in line of duty that they and their dependents are discriminated against in the matter of pensions. Our country, and we in the Congress who direct legislation, are responsible for this disgraceful inequality existing in our pension system. If a man is totally disabled on the Squalus or other such service, he will receive a pension of but $45 as against $100 for war veterans identically disabled. In the event of his death his mother would receive but $15 against the war mother's pension of $45. His widow would receive but $22 against the $30 for the war widow, and his child would receive but $6 against the $10 for the war veteran's child. Furthermore, the pay of service personnel is far less than that paid to other employees in like pursuit.

We cannot help these boys who paid the supreme sacrifice in answer to the call of duty. We can, however, see that legislation is speedily enacted which will eradicate the inequalities in affording pension relief to their dependents and their associates engaged in this hazardous service in the defense and protection of our country.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MAY 30, 1939

The House was called to order by the Speaker at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the Father of us all, in whose changeless love we have our being, as this sacred Memorial Day recurs we lift our grateful hearts to Thee. We praise Thee for that overruling Providence which hitherto has shaped and guided the destiny of our Republic; at its altar may we kneel. We pray that the oppressed everywhere may go free, that the hearts of selfish men may be melted into brotherly love, that the sanctity of human life may increase, that the purity and sweetness of the home may feel the breath of God, and that all creeds may be swallowed up in pure religion. As the tears of the Blue and the tears of the Gray mingle over the graves of their sacred dead, grant that one flag may wave in triumph over a united country—one land and one heart forevermore. In the name of the world's Saviour. Amen.

MEMORIAL SERVICES

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives presided. The Chaplain, Dr. Montgomery:

Almighty God, unto whom all hearts are open, all desires known, and from whom no secrets are hid, cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of Thy Holy Spirit, that we may perfectly love Thee and worthily magnify Thy holy name. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Mr. John Carter sang, I Know That My Redeemer Liveth. by Dudley Buck.

SCRIPTURE READING AND PRAYER

The Chaplain, Dr. Montgomery:

I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on Me though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever believeth on Me shall never die.

For we know that if the earthly house of our tabernacle be dissolved we have a building from God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: He leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul: He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His name's sake. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me. Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: Thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever.

Lord, Thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever Thou hadst formed the earth and the world; even from everlasting to everlasting Thou art God. For a thousand years in Thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past and as a watch in the night. Thou carriest them away as with a flood; they are as asleep; They are like grass: In the morning it flourisheth and groweth up; in the evening it is cut down and withereth. So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.

Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in Me. In My Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you; for I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto Myself, that where I am ye may be also. . .

I heard a voice from heaven saying, write: Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they rest from their labors; for their works do tollow them.

Heavenly Father, our Companion of The Lonely Way: O Thou whose star stood above the Judean hills, be very graciously near us and draw aside the veil of grief. Let us not mourn, as those who love and lose in this fading world: let Thy full-orbed spirit be upon our waiting souls like the dawn upon the hills of earth. How firm, how strong, how sovereign is that manhood that lives and breathes through Thee. May that peace prevail among us that might even flow from the robes of angels. Let us hear the evening hymn that calls us from the language of earth to the language of heaven. O Thou who didst bow Thy head upon the cross and passed beneath the shadow of pain and dying, comfort the sorrowing ones who linger here. Dear Lord. so often our reason wrestles for the daybreak and asks for the way, the truth and light; on the wings of our prayer we come to Thee in our weakness. Keep us all in the shelter of Thy presence until the stream of death we cross-and unto Thee be eternal praise.

> If on a quiet sea, on a quiet sea, Toward heaven we calmly sail ith grateful hearts, O God to Thee, We'll own the favoring gale. With Teach us in every state,

To make Thy will our own;
And when the joys of sense depart
To live by faith alone.

Through Christ our Saviour.

The Temple Quartette sang Rest in Peace, by Schubert. Hon. Thomas A. Jenkins, a Representative from the State of Ohio, delivered the following address:

ADDRESS OF HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker and friends, the sorrow that we have for our dead is one sorrow from which the heart refuses to seek surcease. It is the only sorrow that we refuse to forget. Every other wound we seek to heal, but somehow we feel it our duty to keep this wound open. We sometimes cherish our sorrow for our dead so that we may brood over it in solitude. Our sorrow for our dead is measured exactly by our love for them.

> Who hath not learned, in hours of faith, The truth to flesh and sense unknown, That life is ever lord of death, And love can never lose its own!

When we first get the sad news that one of our own has gone from us we feel an overwhelming burst of grief, but time, the great healer, slowly and surely calms this into a tender recollection. A gentle tear is then our only outward manifestation. The convulsive agony that first consumed us gradually softens into pensive meditation from which we derive much solace. And among the beautiful pictures that hang on memory's wall the picture of one we loved the most will seem the best of all.

We may laugh with our gay friends, we may meet with them around the festal board, we may listen intently to their songs and chronicles, but there is a remembrance of the dead to which we turn even from the charms of the living. We are always keyed to hear the voice which even the tomb cannot stifle.

There is a scene where spirits blend, Where friend holds fellowship with friend.

A genuine show of reverence for the dead is a mark of culture in any individual. A nation's standard of civilization is accurately tested by the customs of the people as they show or fail to show proper respect for their dead. Veneration for the tomb and reverence for their dead was characteristic of the strong nations of earliest history. This simple inclination of these unlettered ancients to keep fresh the memories of their dead is unmistakable proof that the natural instincts of man cry out for the eternal companionship of those he loves.

In all generations nations have erected monuments as proof of their love and affection for their honored dead. No nation has surpassed us in this respect. All over our land a thankful people have recorded the virtues of their forefathers in literature, in art, in song, and in enduring bronze and granite. The choicest treasure of an individual who has lived right is his memory of his life's experiences—"A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches." The greatest wealth of any nation is its national memories. When Greece was richest in treasures her greatest treasure was her culture. Rome ruled the world her richest treasure was that which held her empire together-law and government. The national memories of our country are richer than our mines of gold, our fields of corn, or our cattle on a thousand hills. Our national memories are more ennobling than our great cities filled with the treasures of art and the trophies of war. In these days of wars and rumors of war our national memories which inspire our patriotism are a safer defense for the Republic than our strong efficient armies or our swift, magnificent navies.

So today we are deeply conscious that we have assembled to pay our tribute of love and respect to our deceased colleagues, of whom we could say that they were-

> Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog In public duty, and in private thinking.

That they were-

Men whom the lust of office does not kill: Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy; Men who possess opinions and a will; Men who have honor, men who will not lie.

We meet from a genuine and generous impulse of our hearts to testify to their worth and to say to their relatives that we mingle our tears with theirs for we, too, love our departed brethren and shall forever cherish their memory. Their greatest and most enduring monuments will be seen in the greatness of the Republic which they served so well. It is a glorious death to die in the service of one's country. It is not important what one gets or what one has as compared to what one gives. These men gave of their time and their talents to their fullest capacity.

> Carve your name high over shifting sand, Where the steadfast rocks defy decay—All you can hold in your cold, dead hand Is what you have given away.

Build your pyramid skyward, and stand, Gazed at by millions, cultured they say— All you can hold in your cold, dead hand Is what you have given away.

Count your wide conquests of sea and land, Heap up the gold, and hoard as you may— All you can hold in your cold, dead hand Is what you have given away.

The loss of these, our beloved colleagues, causes a wide gap in our public councils, of which we are deeply sensible. To the States which they represented and to the people of the sections of the country with which they were identified, no tongue of a stranger may venture to attempt words of adequate consolation. But let us heed the voice which comes to us all, both as individuals and as public officials, and in the solemn and signal province of God let us remember that our duty to the Republic next to our duty to God is our greatest obligation. Let us reflect how vain are the personal strifes and partisan contests in which we daily engage, in view of the great account which we soon may be called to render. Our opportunity to serve humanity is great and our responsibility to assume it humbly and discharge it nobly is commensurately great.

Our association with these our distinguished dead was a rare privilege. All of them, no doubt, came from wholesome Their courage and ambition carried them environment. through the public schools, the academies, colleges or universities as their funds would warrant. They boldly breasted the currents of life strengthening themselves by daring to swim against all currents that threatened to carry them into easy or useless activities. One must have a fair measure of courage and have confidence in his own worth and ability, when he asks an intelligent American constituency to elect him as their representative to the greatest legislative body in the world. When once honored with membership in this great body; once having sworn to uphold and defend the Constitution against all enemies, foreign and domestic, theirs was the duty to see to it that constitutional Government should be maintained and that the torch of equal justice should always be kept burning bright so as to lead those in authority to do justly and walk uprightly, to their own honor and to the welfare of the people and to the glory of the Republic. So nobly did they discharge their duties that they left no stain upon the escutcheon of the Republic. Alongside their irreproachable conduct, we lay the full measure of our love, our confidence, and our respect. While we held our departed brethren in the highest esteem as we served with them, our measurement of their stature might be dwarfed somewhat by the nearness of the perspective. Now that they are gone our appraisal could probably be better expressed in these words:

> A prince once said of a king struck down: "Taller he seems in death." And the word holds good, for now, as then, It is after death that we measure men.

The greatest measure of devotion that any man can show for his country is to die for it on the field of battle. I am sure that our departed brethren whom we strive to honor today would approve a reference by me at this time to the fact that this day is our national holiday known as Memorial Day. Today, from shore to shore, in every city, village, and hamlet, and at every countryside the people are gathered in tribute to their beloved dead. Soon after the close of the great conflict that threatened the existence of the Union there was published a poem inspired by the magnanimity of a group of women who strewed flowers alike on the graves of the Union dead as on the graves of their own Confederate dead. This little poem, the Blue and the Gray, with other contributing features, so moved the sympathy of the Nation that Decoration Day or Memorial Day came to be a national holiday. At first Decoration Day was largely a day for paying tribute to those who had died on the field of battle by decorating their graves, but it has now grown to universal observance. The people, encouraged by the churches, the schools, the civic, fraternal, and patriotic organizations consider this as a day when they can proudly demonstrate their patriotism and when they can reverently show their love and devotion to those who have moved to that mysterious realm we call eternity.

Besides carrying his theme to a beautiful conclusion, the poet who wrote the Blue and the Gray expressed a beautiful and timely prophecy which we hope has been fully and enternally realized in our country. He writes:

No more shall the war cry sever Or the winding river be red; They banish our anger forever When they laurel the graves of our dead.

Oh, speed the day everywhere when the peoples of the world can rest safely in the assurance that war shall be no more. May God hasten the fulfillment of the prophecy of His prophet, Isaiah, who said:

And they shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall there be war any more.

When primitive man advanced far enough to reason and rationalize he wondered whether death ended all. From that time forward one solemn thought has been with mankind always. As the primitive man saw his friends and his own offspring pass away he pondered over it and wondered whether he would ever see them again. When he saw their flesh mix with the insensible clod and their bleached bones blow away with the passing winds, he was dismayed. His mind was confused, and he followed his natural instinct and continued to ponder, little thinking that his plight was and would be for ages the common plight of mankind. Long before Revelation strengthened our faith and Resurrection assured our hope the people of the world were reverently and worshipfully seeking what they thought was the source of good, knowing that if there was a supreme being it must be good. With advancing civilization the matter remained insolvable except for the rather indefinite prophecy of a few bold prophets. It was left to Job, the man of trouble and the great philosopher to give cogent expression to his feelings on this subject. He said:

O that Thou wouldest hide me in the grave, that Thou wouldest keep me secret, until Thy wrath be past, that Thou wouldest appoint me a set time, and remember me.

If a man die, shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come. Thou shalt call, and I will answer Thee; Thou wilt have a desire to the work of Thine hands.

Every rational man has with him always the question: If a man die shall he live again? He is baffled with his inability to prove the immortality of the soul but takes comfort in the thought that nobody has disproved it. Somehow a belief in the immortality of the soul binds the world in a close comradeship.

So through the generations the question has remained inexplicable by the intellect. Many questions are unexplainable by the intellect that are understood and solvable by the sensibilities. The finest activities of the soul spring from the sensibilities rather than from the intellect. When Job spoke, he consulted his feelings.

We need not worry too much about the mystery of death until we understand the miracle of birth. All men come into the world through birth and all are equal then. All men leave this world through death and all are again equal. But at no other time from birth to death are they equal. We of the Christian faith through our belief in Christ and His divinity are irresistibly led to a belief in the authenticity of the greatest event in all history—the resurrection of Christ. If Christ rose from the dead, this eternal question that has worried humanity has been answered. If we believe in Christ, let us hear Him say:

Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also.

To those who are of the house of faith these words are convincing. Encouragement to this view is also given when we recite the long list of the great of all ages who were irresistibly drawn to a belief in immortality. It was David who expressed his faith that he would again meet his son Absolom. The shrewd Socrates included a belief in immortality in his philosophy. The sublime Plato made himself immortal by his writings on the immortality of the soul. In burning eloquence Cicero proclaimed his belief in immortality. The Apostle Paul, who left a greater impression on the world than any other man, the Saviour only excepted, in faith abounding said:

And the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept faith: Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing.

These and other countless scholars, scientists, and philosophers agree with the irrefutable teaching of the lowly Nazarene.

Robert Ingersoll, the great modern agnostic, when put to the test while speaking at his brother's funeral, said:

Life is a narrow vale between the cold and barren peaks of two eternities. We strive in vain to look beyond the heights. We cry aloud and the only answer is the echo of our own wailing cry. From the voiceless lips of the unreplying dead there comes no word, but in the night of death, hope sees a star and listening love can hear the rustle of a wing.

Addison makes Cato say as he sat alone just before his suicide, with Plato's book on the Immortality of the Soul in his hand and a drawn sword on the table before him:

Plato, thou reasonest well!
Else whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire,
This longing after immortality?
Or whence this secret dread, and inward horror,
Of falling into naught? Why shrinks the soul
Back on herself, and startles at destruction?
'Tis the divinity that stirs within us;
'Tis heaven itself that points out an hereafter,
And intimates eternity to man.

Here will I hold. If there's a Power above us, (And that there is, all Nature cries aloud Through all her works) he must delight in virtue; And that which he delights in must be happy.

Thus am I doubly armed; my death and life, My bane and antidote are both before me. This in a moment brings me to an end; But this informs me I shall never die. The soul, secured in her existence, smiles At the drawn dagger and defies its point. The stars shall fade away, the sun himself Grow dim with age, and Nature sink in years; But thou shalt flourish in immortal youth, Unhurt amidst the war of elements, The wrecks of matter, and the crush of worlds.

My friends, change is the most inexorable law of nature. "Change and decay in all around" we see. Only God and His grace are unchanging and unchangeable. Heaven's fair morning has broken for our departed brethren. Earth's vain shadows have fled. "O Thou who changest not," let them abide with Thee.

Mr. John Carter sang A Spirit Flower, by Campbell Tipton. Hon. James P. McGranery, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, delivered the following address:

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES P. M'GRANERY

Mr. McGranery. Mr. Speaker, more than four centuries before the dawn of the Christian era, Pericles, when asked to speak of the first Athenians who fell in the Peloponnesian War, confessed that he doubted the wisdom of any speech and declared that where men's deeds have been great they should be honored in deed only. Today my mind is one with the great orator of Athens, as I stand in this Chamber which has echoed with the voices of the men whom we are gathered to commemorate, our colleagues who have been summoned into eternity during the past year.

Posterity will be eager to share our knowledge of their personalities, gained in the happy comradeship of this legislative body. Because they were statesmen, it is the right of future generations calmly to appraise their service here and judicially to award to them their places in history.

We, who knew them and loved them, find our eyes dimmed by emotion on this hallowed occasion as we unite to dedicate this hour to our friends. Nothing that we can say will soften the pain of loss in the hearts of their mothers, their widows, their children who are attending these exercises. Their grief will not lessen; but consolation, like the morning dew, must come with the realization that they have given a member of their family in sacrifice upon the altar of patriotism. They must know, too, that the period of separation is a temporary one; for the men who are gone from our midst have reached the place of perpetual light where they are united to God, and where their loved ones will one day be reunited with them.

The legacy which they left us is a precious one—the more precious because the privilege was ours to know in the intimacy of good fellowship men whose integrity of character and social sympathy had enriched the life of a great nation.

In them we found no narrow passion of sectionalism, but rather the firm determination to interpret the historic forces animating American life, and the enlightened will to direct those forces to real fulfillment of the ideals of a democratic society.

With Edmund Burke they had come to understand that the distinction between a statesman and a pretender is that the latter thinks of results and aims for expediency, while the former reasons from principles and acts for immortality. These departed Members, whose memories we shall ever cherish and revere, were exemplars of American statesmanship, and their active faith was the foundation of their substantial heroism. A vista is opened out to us luminous with their vision, and we who look through it see a world ordered by God, a universe serene with his spirit of peace.

Today is consecrated to those who have already gone to be with the valiant ones whom men call immortal. Yet we who remain should not be sad—our colleagues would not wish it, for they know, with Francis Thompson, that—

The fairest things in life are death and birth, And of these two the fairer thing is death.

It is the falling star that trails the light, It is the breaking wave that trails the might, The passing shower that rainbows maniple.

Thus hath He unto death his beauty given: And so of all which form inheriteth, The fall doth pass the rise in worth; For birth hath in itself the germ of death, But death hath in itself the germ of birth: It is the falling acorn buds the tree, The falling rain that bears the greenery.

For there is nothing lives but something dies, And there is nothing dies but something lives. Till skies be fugitives, Till time, the hidden root of change, updrives, Are birth and death inseparable on earth, For they are twain yet one, and death is birth.

If they could return to this Hall of Congress they would smile—

As only joy made wise By sorrow smiles at fear, as if a smile Would teach—

Us the serenity of one who has the perspective of eternity, of one who stands and views the centuries from afar unconfused by the sequence of past and future.

We who are here can but-

Dimly guess what time in mists confounds; Yet ever and anon a trumpet sounds From the hid battlements of eternity.

As it did for our comrades. They answered it, not with their loins girded for war, but armored with their valiant faith, eager for the peace that passeth understanding.

We, who shared their last days under the dome of this Capitol, had witnessed again and again the manifestation of the faith which was their treasured heritage as Americans—faith in the logic of democracy; faith in their fellowmen, and in the supremacy of the spiritual force; faith in the essentially democratic ideal of the right of men everywhere to determine the conduct of their own affairs; faith in the ideal of the cooperation of peoples, in the same ideal which during almost eight score years welded together the individuals, who had their varied origins in the many hostile countries of the Old World, into an harmonious and united nation in the New World, where there is no place for communism, nazism, or fascism with their false interpretations of anthropology and biology.

It is not fitting that I should here attempt any controversial discussion, but I should lack the courage of those earnest advocates of democracy whom we are gathered to honor if I did not voice the plea that they would make today in this Chamber.

May God grant that the ideal of democratic cooperation which has been realized in this Republic—and of which this legislative body is at once a symbol and a proof—shall in our time join the now discordant peoples of the whole world into a permanent and united congress of nations.

Many years ago that great American, Charles Sumner, said:

Not that I love country less, but humanity more, do I now and here plead the cause of a higher and truer patriotism. I cannot forget that we are men by a more sacred bond than we are citizens—that we are children of a common Father more than we are Americans.

It is natural, too, that we, as Members of the Congress of the United States, should place the tie of humanity above that of nationality, for each Member represents diverse constituents descended from citizens of all the nations, constituents of all creeds and of all races—constituents who live in harmony with each other, and ask of us only that we legislate for the common good. Their protection is indeed in their fraternity, and the legislation enacted in these Halls for them by us, their representatives, is effective, not because of the perishable parchment upon which it is inscribed but because it expresses the will of the American people with its tradition of fair and honorable dealing, founded upon the principles of equality, first enunciated for us in the Declaration of Independence.

As my eminent and now deceased predecessor from the district which I have the privilege to represent, the Honorable James M. Beck. aptly stated:

The Declaration did not create us a people. We were potentially a great people before it was adopted. Declarations, constitutions, and governments do not create peoples, but peoples create governments and ordain constitutions.

There is today harmony among the varied citizens of these United States because theirs is the spirit of democracy, which safeguards their inalienable rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The human conscience, to which Jefferson appealed in his great state paper, rises higher than the selfish interests and prejudices of nations and races, and unerringly approves what is right and condemns what is wrong. His words gave unto men a new deed poll to liberty, and neither time nor change has clouded the title for the many who have since claimed their heritage on our shores.

Our national strength has increased in the same ratio as our spirit of solidarity has grown under the wise and fatherly government of the Republic. It has been well said that our whole system of law is in its essence only the enforcement of the reciprocal limitations of individual liberty. Every man must limit his liberty by his brother's, and his brother must in turn realize that his freedom is not without the restraint that is upon every member of a family. Each law and each custom which constrains human conduct is justified insofar as it is necessary and appropriate for the preservation of the liberty of other men.

The keystone of American liberty has ever been freedom of speech—a happy heritage won by our forefathers by incalculable sacrifice—a sacred inheritance to be preserved only by perpetual vigilance. It must be maintained inviolate by the guardians of democracy whose sacred trust it is to watch it as zealously as the vestal virgins of ancient Rome guarded the fire of the empire.

The Members of the Congress must be militant to maintain liberty in the face of alien and corrupting influences that seek to undermine it within our borders, just as they must be vigilant to defend the integrity of those borders against military aggression from abroad.

This dual admonition has come down to us in the Farewell Address, wherein the Father of our Country reminded us that—

In proportion as the structure of government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.

Wisely, he affirmed, that-

Virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government.

As he cautioned us:

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all: Religion and morality enjoin this conduct; and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it?

With practical foresight, he counseled that we were to do these things:

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture—

And-

Remembering also that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent greater disbursements to repel it.

The philosophy of Washington, blended with that of Monroe, has been clarified and revivified for the men of today by the President of the United States, as he eloquently declared:

To show our faith in democracy, we have made the policy of the good neighbor the cornerstone of our foreign relations. No other policy would be consistent with our ideas and our ideals. In the fulfillment of this policy we propose to heed the ancient scriptural admonition not to move our neighbor's landmarks, not to encroach on his metes and bounds.

We desire by every legitimate means to promote freedom in trade and travel and in the exchange of cultural ideas among nations. We seek no territorial expansion, we are not covetous of our neighbor's goods; we shall cooperate in every proposal put forward to limit armaments; we abhor the appeal to physical force except to repulse aggression, but we say to all the world that in the Western Hemisphere—in the three Americas—the institutions of democracy—government with the consent of the governed—must and will be maintained.

With his unfailing clarity of expression, the Chief Executive of our Nation has thus summarized the will of the American people, the determination of every representative who has ever been elected to serve in the Congress of the United States.

As the immediate representatives of the people, Members of the Congress were entrusted by the Federal Constitution with the sole right—yea, the solemn duty—to declare war. It is a happy commentary upon the patriots who served their country in this historic place—who daily devoted their living strength to the tasks of their sacred trust—that, throughout the century and a half that has intervened, there has marched a long and distinguished procession of men who have waged in this Chamber an unceasing battle to substitute for the arbitrament of war and death the reign of law, a valiant campaign to guarantee to the principles of democracy eternal validity.

Our colleagues who we mourn today were members of that militant procession whose fealty was to democracy, the mother of peace. They had consecrated their manhood to a great cause, and in this place where we are met today they gave their lives as heroically as any soldier—knights who died in a crusade.

They are beyond the need of our prayers as truly as the martyrs who were baptized by blood. By their death there has been born in the hearts of each of us a desire to dedicate ourselves anew to the defense of democracy.

In the words of Cardinal Newman, we, who must carry on, humbly ask our Divine Father:

May He support us all the day long, till the shades lengthen, and the evening comes, and the busy world is hushed, and the fever of life is over, and our work is done; then in His mercy may He give us a safe lodging and a holy rest, and peace at the last.

The Temple Quartet sang The Strife Is O'er, by Palestrina. Taps was sounded by Winfred Kemp, principal musician, United States Marine Band Orchestra.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., pronounced the Benediction:

Unto Him who is able to keep you from falling and to present you faultless before the presence of His glory with exceeding joy, to the only wise God, our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power both now and forever.

Now may grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost abide with you and keep you always. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I renew my request for unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2229) authorizing and providing for the construction of additional facilities on the Canal Zone for the purposes of more adequately providing for the defense of the Panama Canal and for increasing its capacity for the further needs of interoceanic shipping.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I desire to make a very simple statement. In the very brief explanation of this bill which I made on Monday last, I neglected to emphasize one fact as affording an additional reason for the construction of the proposed locks in the Panama Canal.

The capacity of the present locks has almost been reachedin fact, almost exceeded-by the size of the vessels which can be passed through the Panama Canal locks now existing. A couple of years ago, when the fleet went through the Panama Canal, the superstructure of the Saratoga knocked down an iron fence on the top of the Gatun Locks. maximum capacity of the existing locks has already been reached both as to naval vessels and commercial vessels. The new locks to be constructed under the pending measure would be sufficiently large to afford passage to the largest naval vessels now in the contemplation of naval architects and to the largest commercial vessels that will probably be constructed in many years. That is an additional reason for the passage of the measure at this time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am not a member of the committee from which this bill was reported, and I have had no opportunity to consider the measure at all. As a matter of fact, it was only brought to my attention this morning as I was coming to the Chamber that the representative of the employees of the Canal, Mr. Hushing, is very much opposed to the broad powers which are given to the Governor of the Panama Canal with regard to the fixing of compensation and the making of contracts for carrying out the construction works which are provided for by this measure.

It goes without saying, therefore, that I have had no opportunity to prepare any amendments or to offer any specific suggestions relative to it, but in fairness to the employees I ask unanimous consent that the clerk may read from the desk a statement which Mr. Hushing handed to me as I was on my way to the Chamber.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, of course I am not going to object to the reading of the statement, but I can say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I am certain that Mr. Hushing himself knew nothing more about this matter than did the Senator from Wisconsin or I until this morning. He told me himself about 11 o'clock that somebody in the Panama Canal Zone had suggested that there might be a question and that he himself had not been familiar with it. but that he was sending a letter to me, which I have not as yet received.

I have no objection to the reading of the letter, but it seems to me to come very belatedly when this bill has been made the unfinished business, has been on the calendar for some time, and had been before the committee of the Senate since the President's message last January. I have no objection, of course, to the reading of the letter.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, this perhaps should be said: I may be in error, but, as I understand, the Governor of the Panama Canal declined to authorize a representative of the employees to come to the United States at this session of Congress, as had been the practice in the past. They may be guilty of resting on their rights in the matter; but the fact should be taken into consideration that the Panama Canal is a long way from Washington and that Mr. Hushing, who is also a legislative representative for the American Federation of Labor, has his hands pretty full in looking after matters which the federation considers to be important.

I am somewhat familiar with the situation that existed so far as the P. W. A. projects in the Canal Zone are concerned, because I had the honor and the privilege of offering on the floor of the Senate the amendment to title II of the Industrial Recovery Act which included the Panama Canal Zone and permitted projects in that zone to be considered for allocations and for carrying on construction work. I repeat, however, that I am not familiar with this particular measure and am not prepared to offer any specific amendment to it, because I learned of the matter only 5 or 10 minutes ago. In fairness to the employees of the Canal Zone, who are so far away from Washington, I think the statement of their designated representative here should be read to the Senate, in order that the Senate may know their views.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I certainly have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the statement will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

STATEMENT BY W. C. HUSHING IN BEHALF OF AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR ON PANAMA CANAL BILL, S. 2229

By Executive order, the Governor and several of the department heads of the Canal must be Army or Navy officers.

The Canal is approximately 2,500 miles from New York City and the Governor and his department heads have almost unlimited power. They resent laws passed by Congress limiting their authority regarding wages and hours of labor.

The bill under consideration, on page 2, will permit them to disregard all laws covering such matters and hire anyone, whether citizen gard an laws covering such matters and fire anyone, whether citizen or alien. Being so far away from authority in a spot only 10 miles wide and 47 miles long, isolated between the two oceans and by impassable jungle—the only outlet being by air or water ships—the Canal and Panama Railroad officials are little kings and have abused their authority.

The Governor in past years has permitted the representative of the employees of the Canal and Panama Railroad to come to the United States, providing he and those he represented agreed to present to Congress only such matters as were approved by the Governor. Congress only such matters as were approved by the Governor. This year the Governor would not permit the representative to come at all, and, as the Canal and Panama Railroad employees are affiliated to the American Federation of Labor through their central labor union, which is composed of 35 local unions, President Green designated the undersigned to represent them.

On May 29, when this bill was first considered by the Senate, the employees were negotiating with the Governor about the clause in the bill which permits him to hire, fire, and set wages and hours without regard to any laws, and such haste under such circums.

without regard to any laws, and such haste under such circumstances appears most suspicious.

The policy of Canal and Panama Railroad officials has been to employ as many alien Negro West Indians as possible. There are 3,000 citizens and 10,000 of these aliens employed on the zone at

By Executive order, these aliens cannot be paid over 40 cents per hour, or $80 monthly, but their average pay is only 25 cents per hour. They are employed because they are supposed to be cheaper than American-citizen labor, but this was disproven in 1935 by an official investigation by the Interior Department, as the N. R. A. had $10,000,000 to the Army and Navy for construction work under P. W. A.

Some alien contractors secured a portion of the work and em-Some alien contractors secured a portion of the work and employed only alien labor, so that under these contracts no American citizen benefited. The American contractors did likewise. So many complaints were made that Secretary Ickes sent two investigators to the zone by plane—Messrs. Joyce and Wire—and they found about 35 violations of different rules and regulations, and the Assistant P. W. A. Administrator took the question up in part with the Secretary of War, as follows:

MARCH 27, 1935.

The honorable the Secretary of War.

My Dear Mr. Secretary: The Division of Investigations has recently made a complete inspection and labor survey of all projects in the Canal Zone financed with P. W. A. funds. The majority of the reports of the special agents indicate a satisfactory condition in all respects except one. It was noticed that contractors were employing native artisans at the rate of 50 cents per hour, whereas these men are doing work which is classified as skilled under the original instructions.

On December 8, 1933, Major General McKinley dispatched the attached radiogram to the Canal Zone, which was to establish wage rates. There are three classifications set out therein: (a) Skilled labor at $1.20 per hour, (b) semiskilled labor at 50 cents per hour, and (c) common labor at 30 cents per hour. It is the opinion of this office after several conferences on this matter that it would be unfair to require contractors to abide by the $1.20 rate for native artisans, in view of the fact that our investigators state that the normal productivity of these men is not more than 33 percent of that of a skilled American workman.

I would suggest that General McKinley's radiogram mentioned above be amended to read in paragraph (b) to include the words "native artisan" in the 50-cent bracket.

Sincerely yours,

PHILIP B. FLEMING, Acting Deputy Administrator.

These aliens are employed as clerks, timekeepers, section men, railroad firemen and brakemen, baggage masters, policemen, watchmen, and all the building and mechanical trades.

These officials in the bill under consideration are attempting to enable themselves to extend this system and further add to the alien Negro problem they have already created on the Canal Zone. They wish to do the work which will be authorized in this bill with

They wish to do the work which will be authorized in this bill with these aliens at low wages and long hours.

We have about 12,000,000 unemployed in the United States at present, and no one in Congress should be willing to approve a bill which will deny a portion of that 12,000,000 opportunity to do part of the work which will be provided by this bill.

The 1932 and 1936 platforms both carried a plank providing for the elimination of aliens as employees of the United States Government on the gone.

ernment on the zone.

The sons of Americans who live on the zone cannot learn building trades, as they cannot be apprenticed to these alien Negroes. Canal officials are considering apprenticing young alien Negroes in these trades, however, and wish to make all these aliens citizens, but this would require revision of the immigration laws.

The bill should be amended to provide:

(1) For employment of American citizens only.

(2) For application of the 8-hour law and the Thomas amendment to the Independent Offices Appropriation Act of 1934.

(3) For payment of not less than the rates now paid by the Canal to employees on the gold roll.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk three amendments, which I offer in order, and ask that they be read by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 10, after the word "necessary", it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided, That none of the funds herein authorized may be used for the purpose of paying the salary or wages of any alien directly or through any contractor or subcontractor indirectly.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I had hoped that the Senator in charge of the bill would see fit to accept that amendment, because it provides, as I think should be agreed to here, that no Federal money appropriated from the funds of the taxpayers shall be paid to aliens directly, nor to them indirectly through any contractor or subcontractor. That is the object and aim and language of the amendment; and I ask the Senator from Missouri if he will not agree to it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri certainly will not agree to any such amendment as that.

Let me say to the Senator from Nevada that this proposal was never even suggested until about 11 o'clock this morning. This measure was included in the President's original message on the subject of preparedness. It was included in the discussion of the question of necessary national defense by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff before the Military Affairs Committee, which was made public throughout the United States. It was included in a document which was sent to the President of the Senate and referred to the Interoceanic Canals Committee as early as about the 1st of February. It was included in a document which was sent to the Speaker of the House and referred in that body to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries as early as about the 1st of February. Not until after 10 o'clock this morning did Mr. Hushing even pretend to have heard of the matter himself, although he knew this bill had been pending before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and he knew when it was reported and put on the calendar.

Mr. President, what this amendment represents is simply an attempt to lug into the discussion of this bill an entirely separate question which has been a matter of dispute between the Canal authorities and certain employees of the Canal for a great many years. The Canal authorities assert that they could not possibly have constructed the Panama Canal originally without the employment of a certain amount of alien labor, to wit, men who were imported for the purpose of doing the heavy work on the Canal which Americans were unable or unwilling to do.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President-

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In just a moment. The Canal authorities still maintain that they cannot operate the Panama Canal without the employment of a certain amount of such labor.

Mr. President, that presents a question which is a proper question for the consideration of the Congress, but it is a question which has nothing to do with the authorization of the construction of these vitally necessary locks and with giving the Canal Zone authorities an opportunity to carry out the purposes of the act.

I am glad now to yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the Senator has very well answered the question before I ask it; but it is true, as I understand, that the aliens there are persons who have been living there since the United States acquired that strip of land.

As I recall the testimony before the committee, it would be impossible to do the work contemplated if this amendment should be agreed to because it is not possible to take men from the United States into that climate to do heavy workhard work. Nor would they go for the wages which are paid. So it seems to me that if the amendment should be agreed to. and if the statements made by the Army representatives who have appeared before the Military Affairs Committee have been true, it would be just as well not to pass the bill if the amendment were added to it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think undoubtedly that is true. Let me say further, in answer to the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Nevada, that this matter has just been presented, within the hour, after the bill had been made the unfinished business. I would certainly not feel justified in accepting such an amendment. But the bill probably will not be before the House for consideration for some little time. Mr. Hushing and his associates will have ample opportunity, undoubtedly, to present the matter in the House. If the amendments should be inserted in the House the Senate would have further opportunity to consider them, either by concurring in the House amendments or by sending the bill to conference. On the other hand, if we now adopt amendments which have never been considered until this moment, about which no Member of this body had knowledge until this morning, we preclude ourselves from any opportunity of considering them.

Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If I understand the situation in the Panama Canal Zone, there are not now available American laborers to do this work, so that they would have to be taken from the United States to the Canal Zone. Is that a fact?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Not only is that true, but it has always been the testimony of the Canal authorities and the War Department authorities that the work is of a class which American labor cannot be induced to do; that American labor is neither willing nor able to perform that sort of work in the Tropics. I should say, in all fairness, that that is disputed by some of these organizations; but that has been the testimony.

Mr. BARKLEY. The question I ask is, even if Americans are willing to do the work, they are not on the Canal Zone now available to do it?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is entirely true.

Mr. BARKLEY. So that if they were willing to do it, they would have to be taken from the United States into the Tropics and, of course, used for this heavy work, which, I have understood, when the Canal was being built originally, had to be performed by men who were inured to the climate; and the same situation exists now, I assume. So that if there is no American labor in the Canal Zone now available for this sort of work, and we had to take people from the United States to the Canal Zone, how long would it take them to become so acclimated that they would be enabled to perform that character of work?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We not only would have to take them down there but we would have to make arrangements, which are not presently made, to house them. In other words, it would certainly delay the initiation of the construction work for a very material period.

Mr. BARKLEY. If I understand the situation in the Canal Zone, all the Americans there are either employed on the Canal in some capacity or are in private business; there is no large amount of unemployment among Americans in the Canal Zone.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is no private business, even, in the Canal Zone. Everyone who lives in the Canal Zone lives in a house owned by the United States Government, and the only private businesses which are permitted in the Canal Zone are a few oil stations, for convenience in the refueling of ships.

Mr. BARKLEY. There are other Americans, who live in Panama City, who carry on private business; but I do not think they live in the Canal Zone itself.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly not in Government houses.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the Senator from Oregon desire to interrupt?

Mr. McNARY. The Senator having the bill in charge makes a statement which is wholly in conflict with the rule, that this measure would not be the proper place for the insertion of an amendment which would involve the question of the wage scale. The amendment could not be presented in connection with an appropriation bill; that would be a violation of the rule. If in the work contemplated we are to protect American labor as against foreign competitive labor, it must be done in connection with the bill before us, or it will not be done at all. The Senator argues that we should not do it in connection with the pending bill, which is only an authorization bill, but that we should wait for some other bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I made no such argument at all. Mr. McNARY. The Senator said it should come in connection with some other bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator completely misunderstood what I said, because I made no such argument as that he has charged to me.

Mr. McNARY. Then what is the objection to the amendment?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Because it is a matter which has not been considered by any member of the Senate, and I would much prefer to see the bill defeated than to see a number of amendments attached to it which had not been considered by anyone, even by Mr. Hushing, who proposed the amendments, until this morning.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, anyone who has traveled through the Canal going from east to west, as frequently I have done, would be shocked at the number of aliens, from every nation in the world, who are receiving Federal money out of our Treasury for work on which American citizens are denied employment. I am not interested in what the Navy or Army representatives say; I know the practical situation, that there is work in the Canal Zone, in a climate which is agreeable to American labor, which should be performed by American citizens at American wages. The letter submitted a moment ago by the Senator from Wisconsin, from one representing the American Federation of Labor, shows clearly that the average wage in the zone is 25 cents an hour, in what I regard as a delightful climate. This measure relates to a great American project, involving commerce and national defense. If there is any character of government project in the world on which the American wage scale should be paid, it is a project which involves the national defense.

I am really surprised that the able Senator from Missouri would not accept the amendment and let it go to conference. It is not a question which requires study. Experts are not needed to testify in regard to the matter. A mere statement of the question is sufficient: Do we want to pay the American wage upon American construction in American territory, or do we want to hire aliens who are willing to work for less than a living wage in that country, and pay their wages out of the Treasury of the United States?

What expert do we need to testify in a matter of that kind? What hearings are necessary? Is it not a matter which is self-evident? If there is any bill in which such amendment should be incorporated, this is the only bill which would permit that sort of amendment under the rule. I repeat, the contention that this is not the proper measure for the insertion of the amendment is not a defense. The fact that no hearings could have been had can be urged against the amendment. I appeal to the Senator to accept the amendment, let the House act on it, and then, if necessary, take it to conference.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This is not a question of sending the bill to conference. The bill has not been acted on in the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. Let the question be submitted to the House, and if it comes back, submit it to a conference.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator from Oregon has been in the Senate for a long time. He says it shocks the conscience of anyone who goes through the Panama Canal—and I know he is very familiar with the conditions—to see aliens working there. If he were so shocked, why has he never introduced a measure in this body to prohibit the employment of those aliens? Why has he sat until this bill is reported and made the unfinished business—a bill involving the national defense—and then rise and announce that he has been shocked in passing through the Panama Canal by seeing some aliens, who built the Canal themselves, employed in the Panama Canal Zone?

Mr. President, there is a good deal of "bunk" and demagoguery in a question such as this. It is very easy to undertake to make a play at the eleventh hour and fifty-ninth minute for an amendment which the Senate has not considered and no one else has considered, involving an entirely distinct question which has nothing to do with the measure before us—a bill which ought to be passed and ought to be passed as soon as possible.

As I have said, so far as I am concerned, if the Senate desires to have considered in connection with this measure the question as to all those alien employees who the Canal authorities say are necessary for the operation of the Canal and who, they say, were absolutely and imperatively necessary to the actual construction of the Canal, then the bill should be recommitted to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals with instructions to consider that question in connection with the bill. I do not think any ill-considered amendment should be injected into the measure at this time.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Misscuri. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. I invite the attention of the Senator from Missouri to page 2, lines 10 and 11, with reference to compensation. Does it not appear, from a reading of that language, that there is no limitation upon the Governor paying $25 an hour if he chooses so to do?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course, that is correct, and, of course, it is also correct that we have passed many construction bills through Congress authorizing various administrators to fix rates and make contracts, in essence, without reference to the civil service, and I dare say that this is the first one of such measures which have been before the Congress in connection with which such a provision was actually in the interest of economy.

As I stated a while ago, there is a good deal of work in connection with the construction of great projects of this sort, in a tropical country, for which Americans are not suited or able or willing to perform. To undertake to write into the proposed law a provision for the maintenance of an American wage scale in a tropical country, in which much of the work must necessarily be done by a lower class of labor, is simply to undertake to make the cost of this necessary construction so staggering that no Member of the Congress would be justified in voting for it.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield further.

Mr. DANAHER. Does it not appear to the Senator, then, that if we are to give untrammeled discretion to the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone, we should fix some standards with reference to the expenditure of Federal moneys by way of compensation?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I undertake to say that if the Congress, at the time of the original construction of the Panama Canal, a gigantic task, of which every American is very proud, had undertaken to restrict General Goethals in his employment of the labor at hand, the labor it might have been possible for him to use, and to restrict him as to the wages to be paid, the Canal never would have been constructed.

Mr. McCARRAN rose.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. I wish to have the floor when the Senator shall have concluded.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. CLARK of Misscuri. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri a question which is foreign to the discussion now taking place. I am obliged to leave the Senate Chamber for a few minutes, and therefore I should like to ask the Senator about a particular matter contained in the report of the committee. On page 4 of the report is a small item with reference to the Tehuantepec Canal. The report states that there are no existing treaties permitting the construction of that particular project. Can the Senator from Missouri tell us whether or not any efforts have been made by authorized officials of the United States Government to enter into any kind of a treaty with the Republic of Mexico for the purpose of constructing the Tehuantepec Canal?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, so far as I know, there have not been. In fact, I am quite certain that there have not been any. The paragraph to which the Senator referred was quoted in the Senate report from the House report, because the House committee has held hearings on that subject. However, it was the view of the Senate committee, and I think of the House committee as well, that the building of the new locks in the Panama Canal was not in opposition to the construction of any other canal the Government might later see fit to construct, but the building of the new locks was necessary for the purpose of implementing and facilitating the passage through the Panama Canal of the large new vessels.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I may state to the Senator from Missouri that I am in accord with the bill: I am for it: but when we are discussing the Nicaraguan Canal and any other canal south of the United States it seems to me that the possibilities of the Tehuantepec Canal should not be neglected. The Isthmus of Tehuantepec is a comparatively short distance away from United States naval stations on the Pacific and the Atlantic. It is easily accessible. It provides a short route. It seems to me the American authorities should do something to bring about an understanding with the Republic of Mexico with reference to the construction of a canal at that point.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The bill was reported from the Interoceanic Canals Committee without any prejudice whatever to the construction of any other isthmian canal which might later be considered necessary or desirable, but we felt that in view of the much greater speed with which the additional Panama Canal locks could be constructed, in view of the actual physical necessities which have already developed and are rapidly developing because of the construction of larger ships, and in view of the importance of protecting the investment we already have in Panama, the building of additional locks in the Panama Canal should be proceeded with at this time.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I believe the bill is entirely proper. I think that what it provides should be done in view of the investment we have made in Panama, and in view of the actual facts; nevertheless. I feel that if we are to have some other canal. the Tehauntepec route, which is only a comparatively few miles away either from San Diego or stations on the Gulf of Mexico, should be considered, on account of its proximity to the confines of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I express no opinion whatever about that, because I am not familiar with it.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. If I correctly understand, the present Canal locks are not large enough to accommodate the battleships which have now been authorized?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Before the Senator from Ohio came into the Chamber I stated what I understood to be the fact, that a ccuple of years ago, when the fleet went through the Panama Canal, the superstructure of the aircraft carrier Saratoga knocked down an iron fence on the top of the Gatun locks. The information which I have received on that subject, and the discussion which took place before the House committee, would indicate that the vessels which will be constructed in the comparatively near future may have great difficulty in passing through the locks.

Mr. TAFT. I understand from the testimony before the House committee that our ships now building would make a tighter fit, but there is no statement that any ships now building could not go through the present locks of the Panama Canal.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, the statement has repeatedly been made, which is a matter of common sense, that in view of the rate of progression in the increase of the size of ships, the time will very soon be reached when the present lock facilities in the Panama Canal will be inadequate.

Mr. TAFT. It seems to me to be doubtful whether we are going to build any larger ships than have already been authorized. They seem to be the maximum.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The same thing seemed to be true years ago, when smaller ships were built. When I was a little boy it seemed that the superships which were then being built would never be exceeded in size. Nevertheless, we go on from time to time building larger ships, and even this year naval experts appearing before the committees of the Congress have predicted larger and larger ships than have yet been contemplated.

Mr. TAFT. Is the real purpose of building additional Canal locks to have an extra lock in case the present ones are destroyed?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is unquestionably true, Mr. President. It is also the purpose, in building additional locks, to build larger locks, locks which will be adequate for taking care of either naval or commercial vessels which may be constructed in the comparatively near future.

Mr. TAFT. I do not quite understand, however, why, if one set of locks could be destroyed by air attack, it would not be possible that another set of locks 5 miles away could also be destroyed by air from the same air base, if it were near enough to the Canal so that airships from it could reach the Canal.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It might be entirely true that if one set of locks in the Panama Canal were destroyed another set of locks in the Nicaragua Canal, 400 miles away, might also be destroyed.

Mr. TAFT. Not from the same air base.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is entirely probable, Mr. President, and it has been so testified by our leading air experts.

Mr. TAFT. I have been rather surprised in reading the House hearings that the Navy does not seem to be tremendously interested in where the canal should be built, or in urging a site. The short report of the committee says the Navy thinks it desirable to build an extra canal. However, the report contains simply one letter from Admiral Leahy on the subject. The matter did not go to the Naval Affairs Committee, did it?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; it did not. The Committee on Interoceanic Canals is the committee which considered it in the Senate.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Is it not true that the experts take the view that there is not so much danger of the destruction of the Canal by an attack from the air; they think they can handle that situation; but danger lies in that some vessel belonging to a power which is unfriendly to the United States, and in trouble with the United States, in passing through the Canal might drop a bomb in the lock and blow it up, sabotage it, whereas if we had an auxiliary canal, of course only naval vessels would be passed through it, and not commercial vessels, and therefore the authorities would not have to be on the lookout for the laying of an "egg" in the Canal, the dropping of a bomb which might destroy it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is true.

Mr. President, I will say that extraordinary efforts have already been made by the proper officials to afford the fullest protection possible against sabotage to the existing locks. That is the great fear and the great danger to the Panama Canal, and therefore necessarily to our whole national defense, that there might be sabotage.

It is contemplated under this bill that a new set of locks shall be constructed at a distance of several miles from existing locks, which in any time of stress or of prospective emergency would be reserved exclusively for the use of our naval vessels and other public vessels of the United States, and thus reduce to the absolute minimum any danger of sabotage.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator means that on the Canal, farther up somewhere, there would be another set of locks?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I meant to say there would be an alternative set of locks, roughly, parallel with the present set of locks, removed to the distance of several miles, which would be available through the same canal by a system of bypasses. Our engineers have made a survey, and, by the way, have worked on it for several years.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does not the Senator believe that ultimately we ought to build the Nicaragua Canal?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, it is entirely possible that that may be necessary at some future time. The report of the committee was specifically without prejudice to the Nicaragua Canal. It is to be remembered, however, that at the present time the Nicaragua Canal would, in all probability, cost, at present estimates, one and one-half billion dollars; and if such an amendment as that proposed by the Senator from Nevada were adopted, it would probably cost three or four billion dollars. The Nicaragua Canal would have a length of about 140 miles, as against about 50 miles for the Panama Canal. I think the engineering problems in connection with the Nicaragua Canal remain to be worked out, whereas those in connection with the Panama Canal have already been worked out.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Nicaragua Canal would be a sea-level canal, would it not?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It would not be a sea-level canal, I will say to the Senator from Texas, but it could probably be constructed with only two locks, which would be tidal locks. The Nicaragua Canal route is some 60 feet above sea level. So it would not be a sea-level canal, but probably could be constructed with only two sets of locks, one at each end, which would be tidal locks, due to the difference in tides in the Pacific and the Atlantic Oceans.

Mr. CONNALLY. It seems to me that with the necessity for maintaining a fleet in the Atlantic and another fleet in the Pacific we should either have two great fleets or else have adequate transit facilities from one ocean to the other, and I personally think we ought to have two canals.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, this bill, as I say, has been reported without antagonism to the Nicaragua route, because we felt that, irrespective of anything else, the passage of the bill is necessary at the present time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Assuming that the Nicaragua Canal is needed and will be built, we are still going to use the Panama Canal, and we ought to increase its facilities sufficiently to make it available for all sorts of ocean transportation.

The Senator from Missouri commented a while ago on the increase in the size of our naval vessels. Anyone who has been through the Panama Canal on a ship wonders why it was not made bigger to begin with. I went through there once on a commercial ship, and there was not more than 6 inches between either side of the ship and the sides of the canal. We are bound to know that in the future ships are going to be larger and larger, whether they are war vessels or whether they are commercial ships, and it seems to me that, regardless of whether we ever build the Nicaragua Canal or any other canal—but assuming that we will—yet we ought to make the Panama Canal, as long as we have it, as useful as possible, and also provide against contingencies that might arise in the future which would militate against its use at all, either for military or for commercial purposes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, as I stated a while ago, I think the additional facilities provided for by the bill are necessary merely as a matter of protecting our own commercial investment in the Panama Canal, if nothing else.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to invite the Senator's attention to the pending amendment, offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCarran]. We shall have to dispose of the amendment before we decide whether or not we shall pass the bill.

I should be very much impressed by the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada if I thought it could in all reasonableness be applied to the bill. I am not a competent witness. I do not claim to have knowledge, except as an ordinary observer watching the Canal when it was being constructed and passing through the Canal. I have in mind the definite idea that when we constructed the Panama Canal we employed a great amount of the kind of labor which the amendment would prohibit. We necessarily did so. As I understand, the climatic conditions are such that unless an American were acclimated to the climate it would be impossible for him to be a laborer on the Canal.

I favor the principle of the amendment. If I am wrong, those who know more about the subject than I do will certainly be able to give us the correct information. My present understanding is that it would be a practical impossibility to avoid employing many native laborers who are acclimated, and who live in the climate which prevails at the Panama Canal.

There is one other thing included in the amendment about which I wish to inquire. I would prefer—I think we all would—that no aliens be employed in the proposed construction. When we passed the Panama Canal Act I do not believe we included such a provision in it. If we are to be arbitrary and say, as I understand the amendment provides, that no one except citizens of the United States shall be employed, we might prevent the employment of some experts who are foreigners, and who could not be obtained in this country. I have in mind some other Government operations in which a few foreigners have been employed. They were particularly qualified to fill certain technical positions. I should like to exclude aliens. I think the pending amendment would do so.

If the Senator from Nevada or any other Senator can satisfy my mind upon the two questions I have propounded, I should like to have the information, because I believe in the fundamental principle involved in the Senator's amendment, and I should like to see it put into the law if it is applicable. However, it is useless for us to close our eyes to the fact—if it be a fact—that American labor, especially common labor, could not be employed to do much of the work.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, for the first time I have had the opportunity of looking at the amendment. It reads:

Provided, That none of the funds herein authorized may be used for the purpose of paying the salary or wages of any alien directly or through any contractor or subcontractor indirectly.

I do not believe a single Member of this body or anyone else who has given study to the matter and who has listened to any of the suggestions or advice of the men who are most familiar both with the construction of the Panama Canal and its maintenance since that time would fail to be convinced that the adoption of the amendment would absolutely prevent the construction of the additional locks in Panama, or at least would delay their construction for a very considerable period of time until American labor could be assembled to go down to Panama and become acclimated, and until quarters could be provided in the Panama Canal Zone for maintaining them.

I think everyone who is familiar with the history of the construction of the Panama Canal will agree that the original construction of the Canal would have been absolutely impossible under any such amendment as the one before us; although, of course, we all recognize that health conditions in the Panama Canal Zone have vastly improved since the American occupation of the Panama Canal Zone. I think it is the unanimous opinion of the officials who are most familiar with the problem that to say that only native American labor may be employed in the Panama Canal Zone, or in the possible Nicaragua canal zone, or in any other tropical country, is simply to make impossible the construction of such a project.

Some of the so-called alien laborers on the Panama Canal are the sons of the men who constructed the Panama Canal. Some of them are the men who themselves constructed the Panama Canal. They are not citizens, nor are their sons, because they are prohibited by law from becoming citizens. However, they have been in the Panama Canal Zone and have done the heavy work of the Panama Canal for all these years; and either it would be impossible to construct the locks or great delay would occur in the construction by reason of the importation from the United States of labor which is willing or able to do the heavy work involved in constructing the locks, and by reason of the necessity of building quarters for the laborers and waiting for their acclimatization so that they would not all die like flies.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question. Was not the Panama Canal built by the Army engineers?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. General Goethals finally succeeded to the command of that project. Many American Army engineers, civilian engineers, and Americans, who were not engineers at all, were engaged in that construction, and many of them died like flies. A short time ago I introduced and reported a bill affording some consideration in the matter of retirement for Americans who were engaged in that construction.

Thus, Mr. President, the universal testimony in connection with the construction of the Canal, the testimony of General Goethals in his various reports, the testimony of the Army engineers, and of everyone else, is that the Canal never could have been constructed without alien labor, which was imported. Most of the labor was not born in Panama or the vicinity of Panama. It was imported from Jamaica and some of the other British islands for the purpose of doing the work which Americans could not or would not do.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Has the Senator any information as to the number of men who would be employed in the construction of the proposed locks?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I do not believe that information appears in the report of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. At the time of maximum employment during the period of construction under General Goethals, 40,000 men were employed in the Canal Zone. The work was divided into three divisions, the Atlantic, the Central, and the Pacific divisions. As the Senator will remember, one division was under the Army, one under naval engineers, and one under civilian engineers. The maximum number of men employed was about 40,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. How long a time would be required to complete the locks?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is estimated that the work could be done in 7 years, provided the bill were passed in its present form, without the amendment suggested, and provided the present season could be utilized.

Mr. BARKLEY. I assume that the construction of a project of that size, covering a period of 7 years, would require several thousand men, at least at the period of maximum employment. Has the Senator any information in that connection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have not the figures on that subject; but unquestionably we may assume that in the heavy work of constructing the locks and the bypasses necessary to make the locks available, the labor of a large number of men would be involved. I will say to the Senator that it is contemplated that after the locks are constructed they can be operated with practically no increase in the present Canal personnel.

Mr. BARKLEY. I assume that the construction of the additional locks would not require as many men at any one time as did the original construction of the Canal.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is unquestionably true.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am sure that is a safe assumption, particularly because of the technical improvements over the years in moving earth and rock.

Mr. BARKLEY. The amount of money proposed to be authorized for the locks is not far from the original cost of the Canal. The amount proposed to be authorized is $277,-000,000. I think the Canal cost about $350,000,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, the $277,000,000 estimated would, of course, be a very small portion of the cost of the Canal if the amendment of the Senator from Nevada were agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Independently of that, what I am trying to ascertain is the number of men required to be sent to Panama from this country if a sufficient number are employed to do the work.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. REED. I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that I agree with the statement he has made as to the inadvisability of hamstringing construction in a tropical country by what seems to be an impossible amendment to his bill. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] stated my thoughts upon the subject. In a tropical country men engaged in hard labor must be acclimated before they can render any useful service. I expect to vote against the amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. For what reason does the Senator make that statement? My information is quite the contrary. I know from personal experience that many Americans have gone there when work was available, and have gotten along successfully. They did not need to be acclimated. The change in temperature is not such that men must adapt themselves beforehand. In my judgment, all that is necessary in this case is to give American labor an opportunity to work, and it will go there and perform the work. That is all we are asking.

Mr. REED. I take it that the Senator from Oregon disagrees with the views I have stated, but I still hold to those views, with all due respect to the Senator from Oregon. However, I desired to leave with the Senator from Missouri in charge of the bill a thought which I will now express. I am troubled, after the disposition of this amendment, with the wide open authority given to one man who may be Governor of the Panama Canal to spend $277,000,000 absolutely upon his own judgment, without any approval or check or rein on the part of anyone else. Because I am due to attend some important committee meetings this afternoon and possibly I might be absent when this question comes up, I appeal to the Senator from Missouri to give consideration to the latter part of his bill which begins on page 2, line 8, with the words:

For the purposes aforesaid, the Governor of the Panama Canal is authorized to employ such persons as he may deem necessary—and to fix their compensation without regard to any other law affecting such compensation.

To that I have no objection-

I think in that respect there might fairly be a provision requiring approval by the Secretary of War or the Board of Engineers, and more especially-

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I would have no objection to such an amendment as that. I will say to the Senator from Kansas that I certainly have as little disposition to grant any more authority to any Government official or bureau or set of bureaus as has any man in this body or any place else. I will say to the Senator from Kansas that I have no pride of authorship whatever in this bill, because I did not have anything to do with drafting it; it was drafted by the War Department and sent here, and I introduced it as it came here. It was the theory of the War Department and the theory of the committee in reporting the bill that in setting the pegs for a work of this magnitude it was necessary to give very considerable latitude to the responsible official who, of course, is a brigadier general of the Regular Army, operating under the direction of the Secretary of War in every particular, in making his plans and setting his pegs so as to facilitate this work as much as possible.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will permit me, I can state that there is a very sound historic background for this language. We set out to build the Panama Canal under a commission—the Panama Canal Commission—located here in the United States, and from time to time different engineers were appointed to build the Canal. I talked with General Goethals himself in the midst of the construction in Panama, and complimented him upon his work. The general said, "It is not because I am a great engineer; there have been more able engineers engaged in the construction of the Panama Canal, better engineers than I am; but I have authority to act, which they did not have." The earlier engineers could hardly build a lean-to on a house on the Canal Zone without coming back to get authority from the Commission here in the United States. Conditions became so bad and the difficulties and delays so numerous that Theodore Roosevelt took charge, and said, "I will put somebody in charge there who can 'run the show,' and I will give him full authority." So he called in General Goethals, after eminent engineers, such as Mr. Stevens and others, had been hampered by restrictions, and he gave the general complete authority. General Goethals was the czar of the Canal Zone. He even regulated the private morals of the people. If they did not do right, they had to get off the Canal Zone. With such arbitrary authority, as it might be called, he constructed the Panama Canal, and it could not have been constructed in any other way.

Mr. REED. May I say to the Senator from Arizona that czars and dictators are perhaps less popular now than they were when the Panama Canal was originally built?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator's observation, let me say that the wisest thing that Woodrow Wilson did during the World War was to put one man in command of the American Expeditionary Forces. He told General Pershing, "You will 'run the show,' and if you cannot run it, I will get someone else who can; but so long as you are there you are going to be backed up." That is exactly what Theodore Roosevelt said to General Goethals, "This is 'your show'; take it, run it, and you will not be hampered or restricted." It is the only way that a work of such magnitude can be conducted at a great distance from the United States. We cannot have a commission or some other authority acting at this end by cable, imposing regulations and restrictions. That is the reason why we find this language in the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to proceed to the clause to which I find the most objection. I refer to the clause that authorizes the Governor of the Panama Canal—

To authorize the making of any contracts, continuing or otherwise, in advance of actual appropriations, aggregating not more than the total cost authorized herein.

We are not in an emergency so far as the commercial use of the Panama Canal is concerned. The reports all show, including the report of the distinguished Senator from Missouri on behalf of his own committee, that up to 1960 or 1970 the capacity of the Canal would be adequate for commercial purposes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is correct.

Mr. REED. I think it would be more satisfactory if the bill should contain a provision requiring the approval of contracts by the War Department, either by the Secretary of War or by the Board of Engineers, because there is no emergency that requires immediate construction. In fact, this bill provides that of the total cost of $277,000,000 only $15,000,000 are to be authorized for making a start. So I appeal to the Senator from Missouri, whose bill I desire to support, and to whom I am going to offer my assistance in keeping it in the best shape that it can be kept-I appeal to the Senator from Missouri and his committee in these circumstances, there being no emergency to give consideration to the suggeston, not to grant to the Governor of the Panama Canal the unlimited authority that was given to the great genius who constructed the Canal. We might not get another great genius, and, after all, ordinary precaution in business and ordinary precaution in governmental affairs, I think, certainly call for some restriction upon the unlimited authority granted by this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President I will say to the Senator from Kansas that, so far as I am concerned—and I think in this matter I am authorized to speak for the committee—I have no objection whatever to an amendment requiring the contracts made by the Governor of the Panama Canal to be approved by the Secretary of War. I say very frankly that I am willing to accept such an amendment because I do not think it in any material particular would change the bill itself. We have no communication, for instance, as a Congress at the present time from the Governor of the Panama Canal except through the Secretary of War; everything that he does comes to us through the Secretary of War. The drafting of this bill was made in the War Department on the recommendation of the Governor of the Panama Canal. The report on construction in the Canal comes to us under cover of a letter from the Secretary of War, and the report of the Governor of the Canal. Therefore, I say that I have no objection whatever to requiring the approval of the Secretary of War; but I repeat I do not think it means anything.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President-

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Montana if the Senator from Kansas has concluded.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana has agreed to let me conclude. I wish to thank the Senator from Missouri for his courtesy in permitting me to interrupt him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Kansas at any time on any measure.

Mr. REED. I desire to support the Senator in every way I can, but I think he ought to tie the authority for these tremendous expenditures up tighter than it is. He would make me much happier in supporting him if he would do that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator from Kansas will draw such an amendment, so far as I am concerned, I will be glad to accept it.

I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, am I to understand that this bill came from the Commerce Committee?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It did not; it was considered and reported by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, the committee specifically created by the Senate to have jurisdiction of such matters.

Mr. WHEELER. I must confess that I am perfectly amazed when I read the measure to find that the Senator from Missouri is advocating the passage of a bill giving such powers to any department as the pending bill gives to the Governor of the Panama Canal. I do not know of a piece of legislation we have passed, even in the palmy days of the present administration, that simply turned a matter over to one agency and said, "You can go ahead, spend $277,000,000, you can spend it in any way you want to spend it as you may deem necessary; you may fix the compensation of those you employ in any way you want to fix it, and you can authorize the making of any contracts that you want to make in any way, shape, or form that you want to make them." am sure if any other proposal for legislation came before the Senate with such lax and loose provisions that the Senator from Missouri would be standing upon the floor of the Senate denouncing it in unmeasured terms, much better than I could do. The Senator from Missouri would be saying, "Think of it! You are giving to a Governor dictatorial powers." agree that in this bill we are giving to the Governor of the Panama Canal dictatorial powers.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If my friend from Montana had been in the Chamber, he would have heard the fact impressed a number of times-not once but on at least half a dozen occasions-by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. Hay-DEN], by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Logan], and by myself, that in the construction of a canal in a tropical country several thousand miles from home it is necessary to confer unusual powers; and we have pointed out that the original Panama Canal never would have been constructed except by the decision of the Congress to repose very extensive powers in General Goethals, and practically make him the dictator of that construction.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I cannot agree with either the Senator from Arizona, the Senator from Missouri, or the Senator from Kentucky that in order to build these locks it is necessary to do what is proposed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to the Senator that that is our misfortune.

Mr. WHEELER. When the original Panama Canal was built we were dealing with an entirely different situation; but, thank goodness, we have a more enlightened population in this country today, and Panama is a more enlightened country now than it was then. I cannot conceive of any reason in the world why we should say to the Governor of the Panama Canal, "You may employ thousands of men to build these extra locks and pay them any kind of wages you want to pay them. You may enter into any kind of contracts that you want to enter into." Knowing my good friend from Missouri as I do, I am perfectly amazed that he should stand on the floor of the Senate and say, "We want to give dictatorial power to some departmental head." The Senator wants to give those powers to the departmental head because he is living in Latin America, where there are dictators; but it seems to me that is quite a different problem. The Senator also wants to give the departmental head those powers because he is two or three thousand miles away from the United States. In my judgment, that is all the more reason why we should say that these contracts shall be approved before they become effective.

The Senator says the War Department drew up the legis-That does not make the legislation any different than if Mr. Ickes had drawn it up, or if somebody else had drawn it up. Apparently the Senator takes the position that if somebody in the War Department draws up legislation it is all right, but if somebody in some other department draws it up it is all wrong. I cannot follow the Senator in that kind of legislation, because I think it is giving over dictatorial powers to one of the departments.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, at the risk of fourth or fifth repetition I will say for the benefit of my friend from Montana, who has just arrived in the Chamber, what has been said here on several occasions before, both on Monday and today, that in the construction of a great works project in the Tropics a situation exists which is entirely different from anything that goes on in this country. I am as much opposed to dictatorial powers as anybody possibly can be. The Senator from Montana knows very well that I have no particular reverence for a bill drawn in the War Department, although I will say to the Senator from Montana that I certainly have as great respect for a bill drawn in the War Department as I have for a bill drawn at the whim of somebody at the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I am, of course, perfectly familiar with what the Senator from Montana is now doing. He is trying to get even for the fact that I opposed a couple of his bills last week; and that is perfectly all right. I take that in perfectly good part; but if the Senator from Montana had been here at the beginning of the session he would have heard it said several times, "On a project of this sort it is necessary to allow more discretion than on a project in the United States." Heaven knows that on projects in the United States we have certainly granted the widest and most discretionary powers to certain administrators, whose identity we did not even know, in offices which were not even created when we granted the extensive powers; and the Senator from Montana argued and voted for those bills.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator said that if I had been here I would have heard his explanation, which he said he had made four or five times. Let me say for his particular benefit that the other day I did not have to explain merely four or five times the bill that I had but I had to explain it for the seventeenth or eighteenth time because the Senator from Missouri or some other Senator did not happen to be in the Chamber at the time I was explaining it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to repeat my explanation when any Senator comes in.

Mr. CONNALLY rose.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I have been here since the roll call, and I have not yet heard any explanation why we should give to the Governor of the Panama Canal arbitrary power in doing this great work. I have heard the able Senator from Missouri say the matter has been explained, but I have not heard the explanation. I have heard it dogmatically stated, "This must be done," but I have heard no reason for it. I am anxiously waiting for someone to explain and give a reason for the wide latitude that is given in this particular matter. Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I very much regret that my explanation has not satisfied the Senator from Oregon. I think possibly if he had listened a little more attentively, he might have heard something that would have satisfied him. I tried to yield to him a moment ago, because he had been asking me to yield, but he was engaged in a private conversation. After waiting for a few minutes I yielded to another Senator.

I now yield to the Senator from Texas, who was on his feet a moment ago.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I do not care to have the Senator yield now. I was only going to aid the Senator as he tried to repel the assault of the Senator from Montana, who was complaining about this wide authority. Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to have the aid of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. To give political power, political control over political questions is one thing. To give somebody a job to go out and dig a ditch is quite another thing. All that the Senator is really doing is to say to the engineers, or whoever is going to do this work, "Go down there and dig this ditch." He is not telling them how much dirt they shall put in each shovel when they take it out. He is not going to try to control at what hour they shall eat, or at what hour they shall sleep; but he is telling them to go down and dig this canal. That is a wholly different proposition from the exercise of political power.

I quite agree with the Senator from Montana. I recall that the Senator from Missouri was recently associated with the Senator from Montana in a memorable fight in the Senate over the exercise of a vast political power; and I agree with both of them. I think there is no parallel between digging a ditch and reforming the political institutions of our country. When we build a battleship, I presume we do not tell the Navy how many steps there shall be from one deck to another, or what size the guns shall be, or how thick the armor plate shall be. We tell them to build a battleship. If they had to run back up here every time they drove a rivet and say, "Mr. Congressman, how shall we do this?" we should never have any battleships, and we should not have many ditches either.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thank the Senator from Texas.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President-

Mr. CLARK of Missouri, I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator from Texas speaks about building a battleship. I will say to him that no battleship has ever been built without an authorization from the Committee on Appropriations. This measure provides that the appropriation for 1940 shall not exceed $15,000,000; but it provides that the Governor of the Panama Canal may make a contract for $277,000,000 without ever having the matter pass through the Committee on Appropriations. It is equivalent to making an immediate appropriation of $277,000,000 to be expended by the Governor of the Panama Canal without ever having gone through the ordinary processes of appropriation

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President-

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I am not familiar with the general terms of the bill, and I am not advocating it. I was only prompted to interject some remarks on account of the very savage assault made on the Senator from Missouri by the Senator from Montana, one of his late comrades, one of the Roman legions that overwhelmed the Gauls.

Mr. ADAMS. I will say that if there is anybody who does not need assistance, it is the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not think he needed it, but I have such an affection for him that I wanted at least to be arrayed on his side.

Mr. ADAMS. I am not embarrassed like the Senator, because I was with the Senator from Missouri in his opposition to the recent measure.

Mr. CONNALLY. So was the Senator from Texas. I have no objection to having this bill referred to the Committee on Appropriations if that is what the Senator from Colorado is irritated about.

Mr. ADAMS. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that the Senator from Colorado is not irritated. I am merely pointing out the situation that exists. I go right along with the Senator from Missouri most of the time.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado is never quite so effective as when he is irritated. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. Then perhaps I had better become irritated; but both the Senator from Missouri and I believe in the maintenance of the proper functions of committees. The Senator has been very effective on that subject within the past week, so far as his statement was concerned.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I was not effective in obtaining any results from the Senate. I may have been effective in my observations, but they did not seem to bear very immediate results. The Senator from Montana simply overpowered me, and overpowered the Senate, and assumed the jurisdiction of several other committees.

Mr. ADAMS. I merely wanted to make that statement. I do think we ought, without the scrutiny of the Committee on Appropriations, to grant this authority. I say that with all due respect to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. Hayden]. I heard his explanation. We have not here an emergency of a character which justifies putting into the hands of one man, whose personality perhaps is entirely unknown to us today, the expenditure of this vast sum of money.

We get into the habit of talking of millions very easily; but $277,000,000 is still a great deal of money.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Colorado in that observation.

Mr. ADAMS. And I personally think there should be some additional restriction, some provision, other than now exists

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President-

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will yield to the Senator from Connecticut in just a minute.

Let me say to my friend from Colorado that I certainly do not wish to grant to the Governor of the Panama Canal any more authority than is necessary. I do, however, say that unless we are willing to grant to the Governor of the Panama Canal enough authority to carry out the purposes of this act and to make it effective, it would be better to defeat the bill entirely and give over the idea of constructing the third set of locks at the Panama Canal. I certainly am not in favor of any such amendment as will probably double the cost of the estimates and make the project cost above $500,000,000 instead of $277,000,000, because the labor required to do this work certainly does not exist in the Panama Canal Zone at the present time.

I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I am hopeful that the bill will not be defeated. It seems to me a tremendously important measure; but, in view of the fact that the language is disturbing to so many Senators, and because I am disturbed, too, and in view of the fact that the Senator from Missouri has expressed a generous willingness to see the proposal amended in certain particulars, I am wondering if he would not look with sympathy upon a suggestion that the bill be recommitted to his own committee for further study.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. So far as I am concerned, I shall oppose the motion to recommit unless the Senate should agree to some such amendment as the one offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCarran], completely defeating and emasculating the purpose of the bill. If the amendment should be agreed to, I, myself, should move to recommit the bill; and if a disposition on the part of the Senate to include such an amendment is manifested, I shall oppose the bill, because I think it would defeat its purpose in any event, and would on any calculation double the proposed cost of construction.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY. In view of what he has just said, I am seriously hopeful that the Senator from Missouri will sympathetically look upon a motion to recommit the bill. I am fearful that the bill may be destroyed by some amendment hurriedly offered in an effort to correct the bill, which seems to me to have been too hurriedly submitted to the Senate.

Sympathetic toward the aim of the Senator from Missouri to pass the bill in proper form, so soon as I can obtain the floor I will move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Connecticut for that purpose now, though I will oppose the motion. I do not see any necessity for prolonging the debate in the Senate if the bill is to be recommitted.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to endorse and approve what the Senator from Connecticut has stated. The junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Danaher] has taken an interest in this matter, and I have just had a brief discussion with him in an attempt to draw an amendment to reach the end we desire to accomplish.

No one knows better than does the Senator from Missouri, the distinguished Senator in charge of the bill, the difficulty of trying to amend a bill of this importance on the floor. I hope the Senator from Missouri will look sympathetically on a motion to recommit, and will accept a recommitment of the bill to his committee. I assure him that when he brings the bill back, if any effort is made to insert the proposed labor amendment, I will help him, so far as I can, on the floor. But I do think there ought to be some limitation upon the authority given the Governor of the Canal Zone, and there is nobody so competent to write the proper language in the bill as the committee itself.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Connecticut if he desires to present the motion. Mr. MALONEY. I cannot make the motion until I have the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield the floor to the Senator from Connecticut to make the motion.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, because I do not desire to delay the Senate, and because I think nothing can be gained by a further debate on the bill in its present form, and because I think there has been a sufficient discussion to advise the Senators present of the seriousness of the enactment of the bill in its present form, I am about to make a motion that the bill be recommitted.

I should like to say, first, that I am in sympathy with the project involved in the bill. I should like to emphasize that the situation in Panama today considerably differs from the situation when the Panama Canal was built. The zone was malaria infested and dangerous to health. Over a long period there had been failures in attempts to dig a canal. The administration in power at that time, mindful of the failures and the deaths and the danger in the Canal Zone, realized that, if this tremendously important canal was to be constructed, dictatorial power had to be delegated.

The United States Government has corrected the conditions. There is no longer great danger to health. There is in my opinion an opportunity to employ a great many Americans in the Canal Zone now without danger to their health.

I think the committee is competent to draw a bill in keeping with the sentiments expressed on the floor of the Senate today by members of the Senate who desire to see the bill passed, but wish to see it perfected.

Without further delay, Mr. President, I move that Senate bill 2229 be recommitted to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams Austin Bilbo Bulow
Andrews Barbour Bone Burke
Ashurst Barkley Borah Byrd

Byrnes Maloney Shipstead Capper Caraway Harrison Mead Miller Slattery Smathers Hatch Chavez Clark, Idaho Clark, Mo. Hayden Herring Minton Smith Murray Stewart Holman Neelv Taft Connally Hughes Norris Thomas, Okla. Danaher Johnson, Calif. Nye O'Mahoney Overton Thomas, Utah Davis Donahey Johnson, Colo. Townsend King Truman La Follette Lee Tydings Vandenberg Downey Van Nuys Frazier Lodge Radcliffe George Logan Reed Wagner Gibson Reynolds Lundeen Walsh Green Guffey McCarran Russell Schwellenbach Wheeler McKellar White McNary Wiley Gurney Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I desire to say just a few words about the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Maloney] to recommit the bill.

I have no personal interest whatever in the bill except that to my mind it is the most justifiable part of the President's whole program of national defense which was sent to the Congress at the beginning of the present session, denominated an emergency defense program. The measure under consideration was included in the recommendations accompanying the President's message. The general plan was set forth in more detail when the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff first appeared before the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. President, I am frank to say that I believe, and have always believed, that if the United States acts with any sense and any judgment we shall not be engaged in a war within the next few years. But I say that the protection of the Panama Canal and affording of additional facilities in the Panama Canal constitute perhaps the most justifiable and the most vitally necessary portion of the President's whole defense program.

If the Senate desires to delay that matter at the behest of someone outside the Senate who never presented any protest until after 11 o'clock today, that is the responsibility of the Senate. I shall oppose that action; and if the bill fails of passage at the present session of the Congress, I simply say that that is no responsibility of mine.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, my interest in this proposal is exactly that of the Senator from Missouri. Because it is so important to the national defense I am anxious that the bill be considered at an early time and passed. However, because of the controversy which has arisen, because of the misunderstanding, and the possibility that the bill may be emasculated by amendments, because it is difficult to amend the bill on the floor in a few minutes, because I think there is room for much improvement in the bill, for it does grant dictatorial power to the Governor of the Panama Canal; because I think that the power might be more properly delegated, as the Senator from Missouri has himself indicated through his willingness to accept amendments to the bill and to bring action on it as quickly as we can, I hope that the motion to recommit will be adopted. I think the committee, without much delay, within a matter of a very few days, within a matter of a day, as a matter of fact, might bring the bill back with the changes which seem to me to be necessary. Under the bill in its present form, as was pointed out by the very able Senator from Colorado [Mr. Adams], the Governor of the Panama Canal is authorized to expend $277,000,000 and completely to circumvent the Appropriations Committee.

I should like to point out that under the terms of the bill the Governor of the Panama Canal could fix wages at any figure suiting himself; he might pay peon wages to one group, if he so decided, and pay $50,000 a year to one person if he so desired.

It seems to me to be a very great departure from the late practices of the Congress, and I am hopeful that the motion to recommit will prevail in order that we may pass a proper bill to provide for the performance of this very important work at an early time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Johnson of Colorado in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Maloney] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals with instructions. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote. I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HALE (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Byrnes]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Tobey], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. McNARY. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison] to my colleague the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. Holman], and will vote. I vote "yea." My colleague [Mr. Holman] would vote "yea" if present, but I am not advised how the Senator from Mississippi would vote.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Bridges] has a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lucas]. He is absent, being confined to the hospital because of an operation.

Mr. BYRD. My colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass] is absent because of illness. I am advised that if present and voting he would vote "yea."

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. Andrews], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. Ashurst], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Byrnes], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Hatch], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Pittman], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Truman], the Senator from Mex York [Mr. Wagner], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh] are attending committee meetings and, therefore, are unable to be here for the vote.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. Sheppard] is detained on official business.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Chavez], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Donahey], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Herring], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Hughes], the Senator from Montana [Mr. Murray], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Overton], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Thomas] are detained on departmental business.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Balley], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Bankhead], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Brown], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Gerry], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Gillette], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lucas], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Hill], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. Schwartzl are absent on important public business.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Holt] is addressing the East Fairmont High School Alumni Association today, and is therefore necessarily detained.

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 16, as follows:

So the bill (S. 2229) was recommitted to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, with reference to Senate bill 2229, which has been recommitted to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, earlier in the day I offered three amendments to it. I ask that they be printed and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Calloway, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 1569) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. Jones of Texas, Mr. Doxey, and Mr. Hope were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate bill 2390, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the complete independence of the Philippine Islands, to provide for the adoption of a constitution and a form of government for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, with amendments.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, in the bill as reported to the Senate there are a number of typographical errors. In one or two cases it is necessary to change a word in a way which does not change the basic meaning of the bill but states it in better form. I ask that these amendments be first read and adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendments.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 16, at the beginning of line 1, it is proposed to reinsert:

(5) The term "refined sugars" possesses the same meaning as the term "direct consumption sugar" as defined in section 101 of the Sugar Act of 1937.

And to renumber paragraphs 5, 6, and 7 as 6, 7, and 8, respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, line 11, after the word "sugars" and before the word "which", it is proposed to insert "other than refined sugars."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 9, after the word "sugars" and before the word "and", it is proposed to insert "other than refined sugars."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 15, line 13, it is proposed to strike out "(47 Stat. 672)" and to insert "(46 Stat. 675)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 19, line 12, after the word "this", it is proposed to insert the word "amendatory."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Am I to understand that the amendments just read are offered?

Mr. TYDINGS. There was some confusion in the Chamber; but I explained, first of all, that most of the amendments deal with small errors in the bill, the numbering of paragraphs, and so forth. In one or two cases it was necessary to add a few words which do not change the philosophy of the bill in the slightest, but give a clearer picture of exactly what the bill contains. In reference to sugar, no change whatsoever is made in the existing sugar quota.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I heard the words "refined sugars."
Mr. TYDINGS. Those words were added to make the quota plain.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the votes by which the amendments were agreed to be reconsidered until those of us who are interested in that phase of the bill may have an opportunity to examine the amendments.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask that the votes by which the amendments dealing with refined sugars were agreed to be reconsidered and that the bill remain in the same position as though the amendments had never been offered until Senators interested therein can familiarize themselves with the subject.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield. Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest that the Senator from Maryland make a general statement about the contents of the bill and its provisions, so that the Senate may understand what we are considering.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Has any action been taken on any of the amendments?

Mr. TYDINGS. Only those which are typographical, those which relate to the numbering of paragraphs, and the amendment calling the act an amendatory act rather than the original act. No basic change in the philosophy of the bill has been made by the amendments which have been agreed to up to this time.

Mr. CONNALLY. As the Senator knows, the Senator from Texas is deeply interested in a committee amendment on pages 19 and 20 relating to the processing tax on imported coconut oil. That amendment has not been acted upon, has it?

Mr. TYDINGS. No.

Mr. CONNALLY. When the Senator concludes, I wish to take the floor to make a few remarks concerning that

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the votes by which the amendments relating to refined sugars were agreed to are reconsidered.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the bill is far different from the original bill introduced at the beginning of this session of Congress. The original bill covered a wide territory. It covered not only the period up to independence but, in an economic way, covered the period after complete independence. I hope Senators will not confuse the original bill with the bill now before us.

The pending bill deals only with the time up to independence. It does not make any change in the original act after independence. Everything in the original act dealing with the Philippine situation after 1946 remains untouched by the bill which is now pending before the Senate. However, in line with certain requests from Americans and Filipinos alike, it was felt advisable by the administration that some changes be made in the existing independence act of the Philippine Islands.

The original act, called the Tydings-McDuffie Act, provided that commencing in 1941 and extending to the year 1946. tariffs should be levied on products coming from the Philippine Islands into the United States, starting with 5 percent of the existing tariff in 1941, 10 percent of the existing tariff in 1942, and increasing 5 percent each year until 1946, when 100 percent of the tariff would fall upon products coming from the Philippine Islands to the United States, because after that time the Philippines would be a free and independent country.

After extensive hearings lasting almost a month the committee recommends to the Senate 5 percent reductions in the amount of goods that may come from the Philippines in place of the 5-percent increases in tariffs contained in the original Philippine Act. In other words, if 100 percent is established as the quota of any particular commodity covered by the act, in the year 1941 only 95 percent of that amount may come in; the next year only 90 percent; the following year 85 percent; the next year 80 percent; the fifth year 75 percent, and after the fifth year all considerations of that kind are eliminated, and products coming from the Philippines will be on exactly the same basis as those coming from France, Great Britain, South America, or any other country. In other words, we have substituted a quota restriction for a tariff increase-a constantly decreasing quota for constantly increasing tariffs. Such an arrangement is better for the Filipinos, and I believe it can be shown to be better for our own people.

That, briefly, is the reason for the bill. There are other provisions in the bill, but the bill was offered in the first place to eliminate the increases in tariffs and substitute therefor increases in quota restrictions.

The bill has the approval of the administration. Indeed. I think I may say I have offered it at the request of the administration. I was frank to say to those in the administration who were interested in the matter that I doubted whether the original bill introduced could be passed through this Congress; that there was much opposition in the committee, and I believed there would be much opposition on the floor. However, I felt that the committee and the Senate alike would probably realize that there is fairness in the limitations to which the bill addresses itself, and therefore that such a measure might receive the approval of the Congress.

At the request of the administration I introduced the bill, the committee considered it, and reported it favorably. with one or two amendments.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I gather that the plan of the bill is to change the sliding scale from a tariff to a quota reduction basis.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS. Can the Senator tell me offhand whether or not there is the same 5-percent reduction in sugar quotas?

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall try, of course, to answer any question as accurately as I can. However, I will say to the Senator that generally, wherever there was a 5-percent increase in tariff in the original bill, there is in this bill a quota provision to take care of the tariff.

Mr. ADAMS. I notice that certain specific quotas are set out on page 3. I have not read the bill. Can the Senator tell me whether or not the sugar quota, which was 850,000 tons under the original bill, was subjected to a 5-percent reduction?

Mr. TYDINGS. No. The commodities which are in the bill under the quota are Philippine cigars, scrap tobacco, cigar ends, stripped filler tobacco, coconut oil, pearl buttons, and embroideries. In my judgment the provisions of the original independence act in reference to sugar remain untouched.

Mr. ADAMS. That is, the tariff limitation would then

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct. The quota provision of 50,000 refined tons and 800,000 raw tons remains; and all the tariff provisions of the original act remain as we passed the act in 1934.

I think I should perhaps make more headway, and I desire to yield the floor as soon as possible, if, with this brief explanation and making one or two more statements I desire to make, Senators would later ask me questions which, insofar as I can, I will try to answer.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, if it is not objectionable to him at this point?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I just read the amendments the Senator sent to the desk. Glancing at the second one, I ask the Senator if there is not a typographical error in it. If the Senator will observe, it inserts the phrase "other than refined sugars" after the word "sugars" and before the word "which." Does he not mean before the word "shall?"

Mr. TYDINGS. It may be; I would have to look at it again. I would not want to say offhand. I will say, however, that I think these amendments came to me from the Customs Bureau of the Treasury Department and I may have misinterpreted them.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The amendment which the Senator has sent to the desk reads:

On page 5, line 11, insert after the word "sugars", and before word "which" the following: "other than refined sugars."

There is no word "which" at that place.

Mr. TYDINGS. On what page?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. On page 5, line 11. That, of course, will have to be straightened out.

Mr. TYDINGS. We will straighten that out. The Senator, of course, may be correct. I have merely offered the amendments at the instance of the administrative department in the hope that they would clarify the existing language. If it does not change the philosophy of the measure, I have no objection to correcting the typographical errors in the form in which I have presented them.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. At the proper time, I shall ask the Senator to explain what the effect of those amendments will be.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well.

Under the original Filipino Act, too, a large sum of money was to be collected through various taxes and then turned over to the Filipino government, which it could spend in almost any way it desired. There is a provision in this bill which limits the way in which that money may be expended, and it is to be managed under a joint Filipino and American commission which will use the money as a guaranty to liquidate any Filipino bonds, to which it might be assumed our Government is a party, directly or indirectly; so that we will not have claims bills here after all arrangements have been completed and be called upon to pay interest or, perhaps, principal, if, as I do not believe will happen, the bonds should ever be in default.

Another question relates to the rights of Americans in the Philippine Islands. Those rights were pretty clearly defined in the original Independence Act, and we have in this bill given to the Filipinos the same rights in this country that the Philippine government gives to Americans in the Philippine Islands.

Then, too, in the original act no provision was made to retain property now belonging to our Government should we desire to retain it for diplomatic, business, or other purposes. Under the provisions of the pending bill the United States reserves the right to retain any of this property that it now has in the Philippine Islands for any use to which it may desire to put it, whereas without this provision all of that property would revert to the Filipino government.

What I have said briefly touches the high lights of the bill. I understand there will be some discussion of the coconut-oil provision, and I have asked the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], who has made a very intensive study of this particular phase of the question and has compiled considerable data, if the necessity arises, to present the full case on that particular subject.

There is much interest, too, regarding sugar, and, rather than take any chance that I might misrepresent the matter, I asked Vice President Osmena, of the Philippine government, to make clear that turbinado sugar, which has been coming into the United States, would not come in the future, as the refineries feel that the raw sugar should come in and our people should have the work of refining it in accordance with the Sugar Act. Vice President Osmena wrote me a letter stating that as all sugar had to receive a license from the Filipino government before it could be exported to this country, he had received assurances, which he put in a letter, that even if the law were not touched not another license would be issued to permit the shipment of turbinado sugar into the country. Without questioning his good faith, I asked him if he would not also get a statement from President Quezon touching this subject. He sent me on May 29 the following letter, which I should like to have printed in the RECORD, and which I will read:

MAY 29, 1939. MY DEAR SENATOR TYDINGS: In further reference to the question of sugar, I beg leave to quote hereunder a telegram received from President Quezon addressed to Commissioner ELIZALDE regarding stopping further shipments of turbinado sugar:

"No. 326. For Commissioner ELIZALDE:

No. 326. For Commissioner ELIZALDE.

"No further shipments turbinado will be permitted.

"QUEZON."

Since under existing law and the provisions of the bill (S. 2390, Calendar No. 481), reported by your committee Philippine sugars sent to the United States must have export permits from the Philippine government, the refusal of the Philippine government to issue permits for turbinado sugar will be sufficient to stop further shipments of such sugar to the United States.

I trust that this information will serve your purpose.

Sincerely yours,

(Signed) S. Osmena, *Vice President of the Philippines, on Special Mission to the United States.

Senators will recall that a great many refiners thought that the importation of turbinado sugar was a violation of the act, and rather than trust the matter to defining it again, and perhaps having some other content come in, I thought that it would be wise at the same time to have what might be called a definite understanding about it. Having had this assurance from the President of the Filipino government and the Vice President of the Filipino government, and as that government itself must issue permits for any such sugar that comes into the United States, their word in formal statement that it will not come in, together with letters from the Treasury Department, as well as the State Department, that there is no need for the amendment, I feel that the limitation of 50 tons of refined sugar will be respected in every way.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ELLENDER. The fact remains, however, does it not, that under the pending bill as it is now framed 850,000 tons of direct-consumption sugar may enter the United States from the Philippine Islands? As the law now stands, 800,000 long tons of raw sugar and 50,000 tons of refined sugar may be admitted.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. Under this bill it can be all-

Mr. TYDINGS. Raw sugar.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes. But it can also be all direct-consumption sugar. That will especially be true should we fail to reenact a new sugar bill at the expiration of the 1937 Sugar Act.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not think so; I think it can all be raw; but only 50,000 tons can be refined sugar; and, with the telegram covering sugar which is just under what is considered to be refined sugar and the promise that no permits will be issued for that kind of sugar, we have, in addition to the law. the word of the Filipino government itself that the sugar will be sent in a raw state and not in a semirefined or refined

Mr. ELLENDER. The present officers of the Filipino government may lose their jobs at the next election.

Mr. President, will the Senator further yield to me?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes. Mr. ELLENDER. As the law now stands, should the Philippines fail to send any refined sugar, their exportation to this country would be limited to 800,000 tons of raw sugar?

Mr. TYDINGS. As the law now stands, that is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. Under the pending bill, if they choose not to send any refined sugar, they could send 850,000 tons of raw sugar.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. So that they could really and truly increase their shipments of raw sugars by 50,000 tons.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is not correct. Under the present law they can send 800,000 tons of raw sugar and 50,000 tons of refined sugar, making 850,000 tons all told. They could send in, under this bill, 850,000 tons, which may all be raw or 800,000 tons of it could be raw and 50,000 tons and no more could be refined.

Mr. ELLENDER. Exactly so. And I am convinced that if we fail to use the same terms with respect to sugar in both the pending bill and the Sugar Act it would permit the importation of direct consumption sugar in addition to the 50,000 tons of duty-free refined.

Does the Senator know how much refined sugar they have sent to the United States in the past?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am saying to the Senator, in answer to both questions, that the reason the committee worded it in this fashion is that turbinado sugar is so close to refined sugar that we wanted a double definition, a double check, so that the terms of the Sugar Act would not be violated by the Filipino government. If we have not done that then we have missed our purpose.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I understand, under the present law 800,000 long tons of sugar may be shipped into the United States?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. And 50,000 tons of refined sugar?
Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.
Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, if they send in 800,000 tons of raw sugar and 50,000 tons of refined sugar, then the 800,000 tons of raw sugar are refined in this country.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the pending bill they could send 850,000 tons of raw sugar?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.
Mr. BARKLEY. And the additional 50,000 tons would be refined in this country rather than in the Philippines?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is correct. The attitude of Congress has been to permit the importation of raw sugar and have it refined in this country rather than to have them develop the refined sugar business in the islands. To speak frankly, that is what the Congress, and particularly those interested in sugar legislation, wanted. We thought we were meeting that view by putting the possibility of cutting out the exportation of refined sugar up to them, and having it all in the raw state instead of the refined state, and they were satisfied to proceed in that way.

Mr. BARKLEY. That constitutes an advantage to this country, because all the sugar will be refined here.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes, and will provide employment in this country which would not otherwise exist.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let me ask the Senator another question. Considering the probable difference in the restriction of importations by reason of the stepping up of the tariff 5 percent, as would be done under the present law-

Mr. TYDINGS. Not in the case of sugar.

Mr. BARKLEY. No, but providing in this bill that instead of stepping it up 5 percent the imports shall be automatically reduced 5 percent, can the Senator advise us under which plan the largest amount of imports would probably occur?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I think I can. In some cases, on some particular products, it is possible that the tariff might cut down importations more than the quota would do so. On other products, because of the particular economic factors that enter into the production of those products, it might be that the quota would cut down importations more than the tariff would do so. I may say to the Senator, however, that on a couple of the products, like embroideries, if we do not have the quota it is quite likely that the entire industry in the Philippine Islands will go out of existence.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is true, though, that a definite reduction in quotas brings about a more specific reduction in imports than might be possible under a 5 percent higher tariff?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct; and it allows the Filipino people to know exactly how much they may produce, and toreadjust their economy, which all of us want them to have a chance to do.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the tariff step-up the amount would be more or less speculative, whereas under this plan it is really definite?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, perhaps the Senator has stated-if not, I think he might with great propriety statethat the most recent report from the Agricultural Department and the State Department shows that the Philippine Islands are now the fifth largest customer of American commodities. In other words, there are only four countries which purchase a larger quantity of American goods than do the Philippines; and the Philippines therefore are a very important market for the products of the United States.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator for his contribution. What we tried to do in the bill which is pending before the Senate was to obtain the maximum amount of prosperity for both countries without seriously injuring anything in either country, so far as we could. It was not possible to work out the matter with complete perfection to the satisfaction of all parties concerned; but we tried to take into consideration the welfare of our own country selfishly, the welfare of the Filipino people selfishly, and then in a more tolerant way the welfare of both countries, and to adjust the facts and circumstances to that particular situation, because the Philippines are one of our good customers, and we do not want to destroy that buying power, particularly at this time of unemployment.

Mr. President, I understand that some amendments may be offered from the floor. Only two amendments are offered by the committee, I believe. I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be first acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRUMAN in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Maryland to explain the effect of the amendments which he has just proposed from the floor?

It would appear from the text of the amendments which were read from the desk today that the phrase "other than refined sugars" is being inserted in the bill in two places. The provisions which are changed by this amendment are provisions which govern the allocation of the quota by the Philippine government. My question to the Senator is intended to develop information as to what will be the effect upon the bill of inserting this phrase in two places.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, has the Senator from Maryland yielded the floor?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; the Senator has just yielded for a question.

Mr. ELLENDER. I desire to ask him another question.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, without taking either Senator off the floor I am going to ask, if I may, in order to get one situation disposed of, if the Senate will not unanimously agree, on page 5, line 11, after the word "sugars", to insert the words "other than refined sugars." That is what we have just been discussing.

Mr. ELLENDER. The question I desired to ask the Senator from Maryland is: Where does he find the language in the bill that prescribes that the 800,000 tons of sugar shall be raw sugar? As I understand the language on page 4, line 11, it says:

Upon all Philippine sugars, which are entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption.

And on page-Mr. O'MAHONEY (interposing). Mr. President, may I answer for the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. TYDINGS. Go ahead.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. My impression is that the Senator from Louisiana was not on the floor when the Senator from Maryland presented an amendment by which lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 16 are restored to the bill. As the measure was reported by the committee, those three lines were to have been eliminated. The committee now restores them to the bill: and I think that covers the primary question in which those of us who are representing sugar-producing States were very much interested.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator from Louisiana was on the floor and that is not his understanding. That language has not been restored. Mr. President, I repeat, will the Senator point out the language as it now appears in the bill that makes it certain that only raw sugars will be permitted to enter and not direct consumption sugar. As I remarked a few minutes ago it is essential that the same terms with respect to sugar be used in both the pending bill and the 1937 Sugar Act.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, that means that the committee amendment was not agreed to?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Exactly; that is my understanding. The committee amendment has been withdrawn, and the bill now is before the Senate containing this sentence:

The term "refined sugars" possesses the same meaning as the term "direct consumption sugar" as defined in section 101 of the Sugar Act of 1937.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, does the Senator mean that that language is out or in?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The words I have just read will appear in the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, that is not correct. No effort has been made to withdraw any amendment. I did not understand the Senator. This particular provision I asked to have written by the Tariff Division of the State Department, which has control over reciprocal treaties, and referred to the customs; and I have here letters from Mr. Gibbons, and likewise the wording in the report.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I am basing my statement upon the first two lines of the amendment which he himself just offered from the floor and sent to the desk.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; the Senator is perfectly correct about that. He and I are talking about two different things. Mr. LODGE. Then the language at the top of page 16 is just as it originally appeared in the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The present occupant of the chair has just taken the chair, but he is advised that the Senator from Maryland offered certain amendments which were agreed to; but later, on the request of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], those amendments were reconsidered, and none of them has

The Senator from Maryland first asked unanimous consent that committee amendments be first considered. That consent was given. Then the Senator from Maryland asked unanimous consent that on page 5, line 11, certain words be inserted; and that is the question now before the Senate.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think the Chair has correctly stated the parliamentary situation; but before I can give consent to the adoption of the amendment just proposed by the Senator I want to clear up the effect of these amendments upon the importation of Philippine sugar.

As I was discussing the amendment with the Senator, a question was raised by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] dealing with the primary issue of refined and direct-consumption sugars and as to what they mean. I am calling his attention to the fact that the first amendment which was offered by the Senator from Maryland today was to reinsert lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 16. As the bill was reported by the committee, those lines were stricken out. They are now reinserted; so that if the bill is enacted as the chairman of the committee now urges it, it will contain this sentence:

The term "refined sugars" possesses the same meaning as the term "direct consumption sugar" as defined in section 101 of the Sugar Act of 1937.

I may say that that is altogether satisfactory to me, and I believe it is quite satisfactory to all of us who represent sugar-producing States.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator says the first three lines on page 16 remain in the bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the amendment which the Senator now offers is adopted.

Mr. WHEELER. All it would be necessary to do, if it is desired to have those three lines remain, is not to adopt the committee amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Exactly; so that the motion would be to withdraw or reject the amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes. I suggest to the Senator from Maryland, in order that we may clear up this matter, that he ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment on page 16 be rejected.

Mr. TYDINGS. I will do that, if the Senator will yield just a moment. Let me say, in order that there may be no anxiety about any change in the quotas on sugar, and that there may be no further anxiety about the importation in the future of turbinado sugar, not only does the committee amendment define how much sugar of all classes may come in, and no more, but I have previously read the statement of the President of the Philippines and the Vice President that no permits will be issued for the exportation to the United States of semirefined sugar from the Philippine Islands. So that either way, and certainly by both ways, the condition of which many have complained will not come to

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. As soon as I make a request I will yield. ask unanimous consent for the consideration in order of the amendments which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now before the Senate is the request of the Senator from Maryland that on page 5, line 11, there be inserted the words which the Senator has stated and which the Chair will ask the Senator to state again.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask that that amendment be withdrawn and that the amendments which I have sent to the desk be read in order and acted upon by the Senate. They will carry the idea through the entire bill in line with the discussion on the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Senator from Maryland proposes that the Senate reject the committee amendment to strike out lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 16 and to change the numbering of the paragraphs.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland for the RECORD whether it is not his understanding, as it is mine, that the adoption of this amendment will give the American sugar-refining interests every safeguard they request?

Mr. TYDINGS. It certainly will, and, in addition to that, it will make explicit what the Congress has already said in a formal law so that there cannot be any doubt in the future as to what was intended by Congress.

Mr. LODGE. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 16, line 1.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the second amendment submitted by the Senator from Maryland,

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, line 11, it is proposed to insert after the word "sugars" and before the word "shall" the words "other than refined sugar."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Maryland to explain the effect of the amendment. I take it that this amendment and the next succeeding one are intended to serve the same purpose.

Mr. TYDINGS. The best way to explain the amendment is to read the text as it would be if amended:

The quotas for sugars other than refined sugar shall be allocated annually to the sugar-producing mills and the planters supplying the mills.

And so forth. In other words, after the Philippines, in the Sugar Act, were allowed 800,000 long tons of raw sugar, it became necessary for the Philippine government to say who was going to produce the raw sugar. As we wanted to treat all of the Filipino sugar producers fairly, insofar as we could control the matter without infringing on the rights of the Filipino government, we merely inserted the provision that those quotas should be fixed equitably among the sugar producers of the Philippines. It applies only to raw sugar, because there is only one refinery of any consequence in the islands. Does that explain it?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is my understanding that the amendment pending and the succeeding amendment apply solely to the activities of the Philippine officials, and do not in any manner whatsoever affect the importation of refined sugar to the United States.

Mr. TYDINGS. Not in the slightest way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment submitted by the Senator from Maryland.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 9, after the word "sugars" and before the word "and", it is proposed to insert the words "other than refined sugar."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair informs the Senator from Maryland that the next two amendments sent to the desk have already been agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, as has been very properly pointed out by the Senator from Utah [Mr. King], the Philippine Islands now occupy a position as our fifth best customer in all the world.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, his amendment is not now before the Senate, is it?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; I am making some general observations.

When we took over the Philippine Islands they had a population of about 7,000,000. The population has increased to 17,000,000, and that is one reason why we have such good trade with them.

Senators will find in examining the bill that we are not just doing something good and altruistic for a people across the Pacific; we are conferring substantial benefits upon the United States. As I have stated, the Philippines are our fifth best customer, and among the products of which they buy most are, first, cotton textiles. They have been among our very best customers in all the world. Last year they bought 39 percent of all the cotton textiles exported from this country. To insure that that market shall not be lost the pending bill I read from the report of the joint preparatory committee:

The committee, therefore, recommends that the Philippine tariff on cotton textiles be increased. It recommends the adoption of the schedules specifically set forth in appendix III, which schedules, if made effective simultaneously with the termination of the "gentleman's agreement," should not increase materially the prices paid by Philippine consumers.

The bill specifically refers to the recommendations made by the joint preparatory committee and states that they shall be carried out. The recommendation as to cotton textiles is that the Philippine tariffs shall be raised as against the rest of the world, and the United States shall continue to have free entry for cotton textiles into the Philippine Islands. That means, in effect, the elimination of Japanese competition to a very large extent. The Japanese were taking that business away from us entirely, but by the gentleman's agreement, referred to heretofore, they agreed not to take more than half of it. If the pending bill shall be enacted into law and its terms carried out, we will have a very much better market for cotton textiles in the Philippine Islands.

Our next large item of export to the Philippine Islands is evaporated milk. In the last year we sent to the Philippines 49.3 percent of all the evaporated milk which was shipped out of the United States. It is a very excellent market. However, there has been increasing competition in evaporated milk in that market from the Netherlands. The pending bill provides that the Philippine tariff on condensed milk shall be increased from 10 to 25 percent ad valorem as against the rest of the world and that from now until 1946 the American condensed milk shall have free entry into the Philippine Islands.

The next large item of export to the Philippines is canned fish. Of canned sardines we send to the Philippines 26.5 percent of our exports to all the world. The bill provides for increased Philippine duties on all canned fish, giving, again, a preference for American canned fish in that market. What is true of canned sardines is also true of canned mackerel; 26.2 percent of all the canned mackerel shipped out of the United States last year went to the Philippine Islands.

They are good customers for our corrugated iron. They buy our automobiles. We have educated them over a period of 40 years to know and understand American products. We have taught them the English language, so that they can read and understand the advertisements in American magazines. It is a market we do not want to lose; it is advantageous to us.

The only way the Philippines can do business in the United States is by having purchasing power, and that is why I favor the provisions of the pending bill, which allow a quota of sugar to come to the United States. If the Filipinos can sell their sugar here, they can buy our canned fish, our condensed milk, our automobiles, and the other products they have been purchasing from us. The same thing is true of their cordage and the same is true of their coconut oil. I mention the latter because that is the subject of the next amendment to be considered in the bill.

I wish to state briefly why the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions made a recommendation that the excise tax of 3 cents per pound on coconut oil, now levied when it comes in from the Philippine Islands, should be taken off so far as denatured coconut oil is concerned.

Of the coconut oil imported into the United States, 68 percent is used in soap. If it is denatured, it could still go to that market. Thirty-two percent goes into food products.

The committee proposes to admit denatured coconut oil free, but to continue the excise tax of 3 cents per pound upon any coconut oil which comes in for food purposes.

We made that provision because it was in the interest of our own country. We found that as a result of the provision of law which requires that the export taxes be returned to the Philippines for the 4 years, 1935, 1936, 1937, and 1938, a total of $65,000,000 was collected in the United States at the expense of our Government and remitted to the Philippine Islands. The average for the 4-year period was $16,358,497. In the first 9 months of the present year $14,000,000 had already been collected. At the present rate we will collect around $18,000,000 this year in the United States and remit it to the Philippine Islands. Those figures are what the committee considered in making its recommendations.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Russell in the chair).

Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona what he thinks the effect would be if the 3-cent tariff were cut off; whether the coconut oil would come in that much cheaper, and, if it did, would it not have the effect of reducing the price of our fats and oils here in the United States?

Mr. HAYDEN. That brings me to the next fact which induced the Senate committee to recommend this amendment. We ascertained as a fact that in a little less than 5 years there had been accumulated in this country practically $80,000,000 which we must give to the Philippine government. If in doing that we had cut down the uses of coconut oil in the United States, it might have been entirely justified. But I want to give the Senate the figures for the years before the tax was imposed and after the tax went into effect, to show that it had no effect at all.

The tax was imposed in 1934. Let us take the 4 years before that: In 1931, 592,000,000 pounds of coconut oil came to the United States; in 1932, 549,000,000 pounds; in 1933, 583,000,000 pounds; in 1934—the year in which the tax was imposed-585,000,000 pounds; in 1935, 582,000,000 pounds; in 1936, 602,000,000 pounds; in 1937, 425,000,000 pounds. In 1938, 555,000,000 pounds of coconut oil came in.

Senators can see from those figures that, although the 3-cent tax was imposed, coconut oil still came in from the Philippines in practically the same volume. There must be a reason for that. The reason is perfectly simple—that good soap cannot be made without the use of coconut oil.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield. Mr. PEPPER. I wish to ask the Senator if it might be possible that the need for that kind of oil expanded, and in spite of the fact that the quantity which came in increased, there still might have been some diminution in quantity by reason of the imposition of the tax.

Mr. HAYDEN. No, Mr. President. The principal use of the coconut oil in the United States is to make soap. Imported oils that go into soap must contain lauric acid. When coconut oil goes into food products, the committee does not propose to change the rate at all. Personally I think that is entirely sound. We have this broad fact to consider, that in the United States for many years, except in the drought years, we ordinarily have had a great surplus of edible oils and fats, more than we needed. We exported large quantities of lard and other fats; but we have always had a shortage of inedible oils and fats, and that being the case, we must distinguish between the two, and that is what the amendment does.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. Can the edible oils be substituted for the inedible oils in soap making?

Mr. HAYDEN. No.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask the question because in the amendment there is provision for the treatment of certain oils so they might not be edible.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. Coconut oil can be very satisfactorily denatured. Coconut oil can be so treated that it can no longer be consumed as food. It is made to be very, very bitter. Congress has imposed that duty upon the Treasury Department, and they have been denaturing oils for the last 25 years. If the oil is properly denatured, it is no longer ed'ble and no longer competes with American edible oil. Without being denatured, coconut oil can be used for edible and nonedible purposes. But what the committee is proposing by the amendment is the admission only of coconut oil that is nonedible. The principal destination of that oil is the soap kettle.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. Is there any limitation upon the amount of the denatured coconut oil that can be brought into the United States?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is a limitation in the quota of coconut oil manufactured in the Philippines that can come in.

Mr. ELLENDER. I have particular reference to the amount that is to come in a denatured form for the purpose of making soap.

Mr. HAYDEN. The law now provides, and the amendment contemplates, that if copra comes in and oil is pressed out of it, the manufacturer shall pay the excise tax if there is a tax to be paid on the edible part of it. On the part that is being made inedible, he pays no tax. If the coconut oil comes from the Philippine Islands and is purchased by a soap factory, that would be the first domestic processing of that cil, and the soap maker pays the tax now. He would not have to pay it if it were denatured oil.

Mr. ELLENDER. My information is that as much as 448,-000,000 pounds of this denatured coconut oil is to be permitted to be imported into this country under the proposed legislation. Is that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is hardly as much as has been coming in, so it is within the limit. We imported 555,000,000 pounds this year. And as I just read the Senate the figures, we imported 602,000,000 pounds in 1936, and 582,000,000 pounds in 1935.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator has stated the entire amount of coconut oil importations. I had reference to the denatured oil that may be permitted under the bill. Mr. President, would the Senator agree to an amendment limiting the amount of denatured coconut oil?

Mr. HAYDEN. I cannot see any possible advantage in doing that. The purpose of the amendment would be destroyed. What we are trying to do is to let oil come in to be used in making soap, and not to be taxed, because the tax is paid by the American consumer.

Mr. ELLENDER. If the bill is passed the American consumer will pay just the same. I predict that the soap will not sell any cheaper than it is now sold, and the manufacturer is going to get the benefit. Why not put a limitation? Why not place a limitation of say 362,000,000 pounds, the amount consumed last year by soap manufacturers.

Mr. HAYDEN. When the tax was imposed the price of soap went up. I quoted the figures from the hearings before the Committee on Finance in that respect.

Mr. ELLENDER. They had a good reason to cause the price of soap to go up. They are going to take advantage of this tax rebate, as it were, and make the American people pay just the same.

Mr. HAYDEN. The tax is paid in one of two places. It is paid either by the American consumer or paid by the Philippine producer of coconut oil. My judgment is that when times are good and there is a demand for oil all over the world, it is paid by the American consumer. When times are bad it is reflected back and paid by the coconut grower in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. ELLENDER. I have before me a statement from the Department of Commerce showing that in the year 1938, 702,000,000 pounds of inedible tallow was used in the making of soap.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. With this cheaper coconut oil coming in, what effect will it have, in the Senator's opinion, on the use of these tallow inedibles for making soap?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is a question I am glad the Senator asked, because some of the stockmen out in Arizona are asking me the same question, implying that the introduction of coconut oil will displace tallow. There is no basis in any Government statistics to justify that idea. The truth is that we used to make soap out of tallow before we had coconut oil, and then we found that by mixing coconut oil with tallow we would get a soap that would lather in hard water. You cannot make a soap that satisfies the American housewife unless it has these lauric acid oils in it. If too much coconut oil is used it is hard on the hands and women do not like it. If you do not put enough coconut oil in it, and there is too much tallow, the soap will not lather.

A soap formula has been worked out since the World War which is satisfactory to the great majority of women in the homes of America. Of all the fats and oils used in the manufacture of soap, about 20 percent has been coconut cil, and about one-fifth or one-fourth of the oils that go into soap must be the oils that contain lauric acid. Since the invention of the washing machine the American housewife knows exactly what she wants. She wants something that will properly wash the clothes, and you cannot substitute anything for it. That is why, when Congress imposed this excise tax of 3 cents on coconut oil, it did not stop its importation. The soap makers had to have it to make a soap the American housewife would use, and they added the cost of the tax on coconut oil to the price of soap. That was all there was to it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to suggest that the amendment had its origin with the Senator from Arizona, and that there is no desire on the part of the Philippine government, so far as we know, to cut themselves out of $16,000,000 a year of good American tax money. The amendment does not come from Philippine sources. The Senator from Arizona was wise enough to see that we were paying $16,-000,000 of unnecessary taxes to the Philippine government each year, and getting no benefit for our own people.

It is not a Philippine amendment. It is an amendment to help our own people, and we ought to have that situation very clearly in mind

Mr. HAYDEN. That is why I prefaced my remarks by stating that I wanted the Senate to look at this bill from the American point of view.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I understand, from the argument which the Senator has, as always, presented most lucidly, that the only purpose is to exempt from the tax denatured coconut oil which is to be used in the manufacture of soap.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is primarily the use to be made of it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Why not use exactly that language and state it in the amendment?

Mr. HAYDEN. If a plant on the Pacific coast were bringing copra from the Philippine Islands and pressing the coconut oil out of it and denaturing it, the coconut oil would be made unfit for food.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator misunderstands me. The amendment which the committee has reported excepts from the tax coconut oil which has been rendered unfit for use as food or for any but mechanical or manufacturing pur-

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Would the Senator object to striking out the words "but mechanical or manufacturing purposes" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "use except in the manufacture of soap"?

Mr. HAYDEN. One of the manufacturing purposes of coconut oil is that it is used in the manufacture of safety glass. It is the best oil for use in the composition which is put between the panes of safety glass, which is used in automobiles. All kinds of oils have been used in making the composition which is put between the two panes of glass, and coconut oil has been found to be the best oil for that purpose. That use is technical, but it does not interfere with any vegetable oil produced in the United States.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator's argument is based upon two instances: first, soap, and now safety glass.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. But the language is broad enough to cover any use.

Mr. HAYDEN. So long as we are protecting the American producer of fats and oils, whose market is for food use, there can be no legitimate complaint.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. But it is not for food use. We are exempting from the tax any coconut oil which may be used for lubrication. We say so.

Mr. HAYDEN. If coconut oil is the best kind of oil to use for lubricating purposes, how does that use in any manner interfere with the fats and oils produced by American farmers, which cannot be used for lubricating purposes?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It might take the place of some fats or oils that could be used.

Mr. HAYDEN. The facts do not so indicate.

I wish to complete my discussion on the question of inedible tallow. I am sure the Senator from Wyoming is interested.

The figures which I shall put in the RECORD show that in 1912 we used about 333,000,000 pounds of tallow and 99,000,000 pounds of coconut oil. The figures have increased until last year, as shown by the table the Senator has, we used 702,000,000 pounds of tallow and 342,000,000 pounds of coconut oil. What does that mean? It means that the manufacture of soap requires more than 2 pounds of tallow for every pound of coconut oil. It is impossible to make a soap that will lather in any kind of water unless the two are combined. So I think the testimony of the manager of the Los Angeles Soap Co. before the Committee on Finance is very appropriate. He said that coconut oil is the best friend of tallow, because combining it with tallow is the only way in which good soap can be made. Soap must be made cheaply. It is used in every household in the United States, and the market has expanded so that for every pound of coconut oil that has been imported we have had to use two pounds of inedible tallow.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. Has the Senator a table showing the proportions of tallow and coconut oil used in the manufacture of soap?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; I have complete figures. I shall put a number of tables in the RECORD. Table 8 in the publication of May 15, 1939, of the Department of Agriculture. Bureau of Agricultural Economics, shows the fats and oils situation. I shall print that table, which goes back to 1912 and covers every year from then until 1938, showing exactly what fats and oils were used to make soap.

Mr. ELLENDER. Will the Senator at this time read into the RECORD the proportions of inedible tallow and coconut oil used in making soap?

Mr. HAYDEN. That information will also be found in table 9, where the figures are transferred into percentages. In 1938, inedible tallow was 39 percent of the component parts of soap. Coconut oil was 19 percent. Soft oils of all kinds amounted to 14 percent, and the rosins to 6.9 percent. There are three or four principal ingredients of soap. The so-called hard oils are inedible tallow, whale and fish oils, and palm oil. The quick lathering oils are coconut oil, palm-kernel oil, and babassu oil. The soft oils are cottonseed foots, soybean oil, and so forth. Finally, there are the rosins. I shall put the table in the RECORD, showing not only the quantities but the percentages. I defy anyone to make a study of those tables over the past 25 years and not conclude that the use of coconut oil has increased the use of inedible tallow.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. According to the table from the Department of Commerce, to which I have just referred, twice as much inedible tallow as coconut oil was used in making soap. Will the Senator point out, in the table to which he has just referred, the proportion of inedible tallow which is used in making soap, in contrast to the coconut oil which is used, let us say, for the past 10 years?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. The ratio continues through the years with certain variations. If the Senator will examine the tabulation all the way through, he will find that the ratio is roughly 2 to 1. Taking the totals from the table which the Senator is showing me, slightly more than twice as much inedible tallow as coconut oil was used.

Mr. ELLENDER. Slightly more than twice as much?

Mr. HAYDEN. Some years the ratio is a little more, and sometimes a little less, depending, I suppose, upon the quantities available in the market. However, as these figures will show, the general use throughout the years, covering a 25year period, is about twice as much tallow as coconut oil.

Mr. President, that concludes the general observations I wish to make. I should like to have the amendment stated. Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Would the Senator object to the amendment which I suggested a moment ago? As the language comes from the committee, it throws open the door of exceptions to any use which may develop in the future. The whole argument of the Senator is dependent upon two uses, soap and safety glass. As I understand his argument. it is that the admission of coconut oil, far from being a detriment to the producer of animal fats, is an assistance to him, because it increases the market for both coconut oil and tallow in the manufacture of soap.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I also understand the Senator to say that animal fats cannot be used in the manufacture of safety glass. Is that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Those are the only two purposes for which it is desired to grant the exemption?

Mr. HAYDEN. I would not say that. The purpose I have in mind is that any use we make in soap, or for any mechanical purpose, shall not be in competition with anything that an American stockman or farmer grows.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. How can the Senator say that when he cannot define all the uses to which tallow may be put?

Mr. HAYDEN. If the Senator will take any one of these tabulations, he will find, first, that tallow cannot go into paint, varnish, linoleum, or printing inks, and other miscellaneous products. Those are mechanical uses of oils. It is simply impossible to use tallow in paint. Other miscellaneous uses of that kind show no use of tallow of any consequence. So there is no particular competition.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course, my only purpose is to see that the amendment is so phrased that, if it is adopted, coconut oil will not become increasingly competitive with animal fats. That is all I am interested in.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am as much interested in that as is the Senator. I am also interested to see that coconut oil shall not come in competition with vegetable oils.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me add vegetable oils, also.

Mr. HAYDEN. My purpose in this matter is simply to try to take off the American people a tax that there is no sense in their paying, which tax, after it is collected, is given to the Philippine Government, which does not need it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, if we wish to grant an exception for two particular uses, would it not be better procedure to define those uses instead of opening wide the door to some use that we may not be able to foresee?

Mr. HAYDEN. I am not insistent about the matter. When the amendment is stated, if the Senator will prepare an amendment I shall be glad to consider it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me offer a perfecting amendment

Mr. HAYDEN. The committee amendment has not yet been submitted to the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are still two committee amendments which remain to be disposed of.

Mr. HAYDEN. I now ask, on behalf of the committee, that the amendments be submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendments?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 19, line 23, after the words "Treasury of the", it is proposed to strike out "Philippines." " and insert "Philippines."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, after line 23, to insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"(f) Subsection (a) (1) of section 2470 of the Internal Revenue Code (I. R. C., ch. 21, sec. 2470 (a) (1)), is hereby amended by striking out the comma after the words 'coconut oil,' and inserting in lieu thereof the following: '(except coconut oil rendered unfit for use as food or for any but mechanical or manufacturing purposes as provided in paragraph 1732 of the Tariff Act of 1930), and upon the first domestic processing of."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas will state his point of order.

Mr. CONNALLY. I make the point of order that the amendment proposed is a revenue measure, and, under the Constitution, must originate in the House of Representatives. If the Chair desires argument, I can make an argument; but it is so patent that I feel no argument is necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Texas that the present occupant of the chair is always delighted to hear arguments from the Senator from Texas, but, under the long-established usage, practice and precedents of the Senate, a constitutional point is not decided by the Chair, but is submitted to the Senate, and the present occupant of the chair will follow that practice.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is agreeable to me. I apprehended that ruling, and I consulted the parliamentary precedents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator from Texas ready at this time for a vote on the question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I desire to submit some remarks to the

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, of course, every Senator knows that this amendment affects revenue. It does not make any difference whether it raises revenue or lowers revenue, if the provision relates to the revenue it is a revenue matter, and, under the Constitution of the United States, all revenue bills and all revenue matters, unless affecting a bill coming from the other House and pending in the Senate, must originate in the House of Representatives and not in the Senate of the United States. So, under the ruling of the Chair, the Senate itself is to pass upon the question as to whether the point of order is good or whether it is bad.

All who have served in either branch of Congress know how important it is for each branch to respect the limitations and prerogatives of the other branch. I doubt not if this bill goes to the House, and this provision is contained in it, together with some other provisions that also relate to the revenue, the House of Representatives will not consider the bill—and very properly so—because that is the only way by which the House can require the Senate to observe the constitutional rule in regard to matters of this kind.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Are there other provisions in the bill dealing with the question of the revenue?

Mr. CONNALLY. There are, and they all originated in the Senate: none came from the House.

Mr. BORAH. None came from the House?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; for the bill is not a House bill; it is a Senate bill. I shall say to the Senator from Idaho, to repeat what I said a moment ago, that there are several other provisions that relate to the revenue, and they all originated in the Senate committee. It is not a House bill at all; and such provisions have no business in the bill. I am sure the Senator from Idaho agrees with that statement, because he knows too well the Constitution and the history of legislative precedents to hold any other view. It is well established that any provision relating to the revenue, whether it raises a duty or lowers a duty-and this amendment, while it does not affect a duty, relates to a domestic processing tax, which is a tax, nevertheless, and it proposes to remove that tax-

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator will probably be successful in his argument, but, unfortunately, I am necessarily called away from the floor for about half an hour or perhaps longer, and I desire now to offer the amendment which I was discussing with the Senator from Arizona so that it may be before the Senate in the event that the amendment is considered.

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield for that purpose, however, with the reservation that I may then proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands. the Senator from Texas yields to the Senator from Wyoming for the purpose of offering an amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; but I shall make the point of order against the amendment as amended.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The point of order goes against the amendment as amended.

Mr. CONNALLY. It goes against the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming as well as the amendment now pending. I do not yield to have the amendment added. I merely yield to have it offered and lie on the table.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly. At the proper time I shall ask that the committee amendment be perfected in line 4, page 20, by striking out the words "but mechanical or manufacturing purposes" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "use except in the manufacture of soap or of safety glass."

I thank the Senator for yielding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands the situation the Senator from Texas yielded only for the purpose of offering the amendment. His point of order goes to the committee amendment, and if the point of order should be sustained, of course, that would obviate the necessity of the Senator from Wyoming offering his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly; and, as a matter of fact, I am rather inclined to agree with the Senator from Texas in his argument.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I am a little disappointed that the Senator from Wyoming, who represents a great cattle-raising State—and the cattle growers are all opposed to this amendment-should seek to sugar-coat it so as to lessen its objectionable features to denature it, so to speak, in order to make it more attractive.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am not making it more attractive but making it less disadvantageous to the cattle interests of Texas as well as my own State.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not for it in any form.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I agree with the Senator in that regard.

Mr. CONNALLY. And when I am against an amendment, I do not want to make it more attractive to those who might be tempted to vote for it.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas a question as to whether or not the point of order he has raised would not apply to the whole bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have not made it to the whole bill. A point of order may be made at any time to any portion of the bill. I will say to the Senator that I have marked a number of provisions of the bill which I think are subject to a point of order, but I did not care to go through the bill seriatum. I was interested primarily in this particular amendment.

I desire to say that, aside from the constitutional argument, it is very bad policy and very bad precedent for either House to fail to observe the amenities that ought to control. What would the Senate think if the House undertook to pass on a treaty or raise a complaint about some confirmation which was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Senate? Of course, we would take appropriate action to show our displeasure.

Mr. President, I desire to read briefly from the precedents. I read from Hinds' Precedents of Procedure in the House of Representatives:

The House having questioned a Senate amendment providing a tax on incomes on a nonrevenue bill, the Senate withdrew the

In other words, the Senate, when its attention was called to a tax provision that was in violation of the constitutional requirement that revenue matters shall originate in the House, respected the privileges of the House, and withdrew the amendment. That occurred on the 30th of June 1864.

Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, submitted the resolution on the subject, which was as follows:

Resolved, That the amendment of the section, being section No. 12, added by the Senate to House bill No. 549, in the opinion of this House, contravenes the first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, and is an infringement of the privileges of this House, and that the said bill, with the amendments, be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

The House sent the bill back to the Senate; and the Senate recognized the propriety of the action of the House, and acquiesced in it.

The bill (H. R. 549) further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces had been returned from the Senate with amendments, among which was No. 12, providing for a 5-percent duty on all incomes. * * *

Mr. Stevens said: "It is so clearly a violation of the privileges of the House that I think it ought not for a moment to be acquiesced in."

Without further debate the House agreed to the resolution. The same day a message from the Senate announced that they, on reconsideration, had again passed the bill with all amendments on reconsideration, had again passed the bill with all amendments previously concurred in except the section objected to by the

I do not want to weary the Senate but the precedents are uniform with respect to this question. I find here an argument by Senator Spooner, of Wisconsin.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield. Mr. TYDINGS. Was this tax added to the original bill in the Senate or in the House?

Mr. CONNALLY. It was added in the Senate on a House revenue bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. I did not remember as to that.

Mr. CONNALLY. The tax was levied in 1934 on my motion when the Senate was considering a general tax bill, a revenue bill, and, under such a condition, the Senate has a right to amend a revenue bill. If the House sends to the Senate a revenue bill, the Senate, under the Constitution, has the explicit right to amend it. That is the way the tax was originally placed in the statute. It was placed there by an amendment offered by myself to a general revenue bill, not a Filipino bill.

Mr. President, I wish to take issue with the Senator from Arizona, however much I regret to disagree with him about any matter of general importance, on his statement regarding the great advantage of repealing this tax. The repeal of this tax will help nobody on earth except the soap manufacturers of the United States. They have been before the Committee on Finance repeatedly. I know them all. I see some of them in the gallery now. Did the price of soap change any after we put on this infinitesimal tax? Did soap cost any more a bar? Not a cent. That has been developed by the committee.

What are the facts? The facts are that every other country on earth has to pay 5 cents a pound on any coconut oil it sends into the United States. In the case of the Philippines we levy no tariff duties whatever on their coconut oil, but we simply levy this 3 cents a pound processing tax. The result has been that, under the law, the Philippines now have an absolute monopoly of the coconut-oil business in the United States. The figures here show that only 15,000 pounds, as I recall, come from other countries. I have the table here somewhere.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield. Mr. FRAZIER. We not only levy the 3 cents a pound tax, but we return it to the Philippines after it is collected.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is one of the main sources of revenue of the Philippine government. The provision referred to by the Senator from North Dakota was made on motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris]. When we adopted this tax originally it was provided that the amount received from the processing tax on coconut oil should be handed over to the Philippine government, and the Philippine government is deriving a very substantial income from this particular tax. Its repeal is not asked for by the Filipino authorities. The Philippine government have not asked that this tax be repealed; because if they had, it would have been in the original bill, probably; but in conversation with representatives of the Philippine government I have been assured that they are not asking that this tax be repealed.

What are the facts? The Senator from Arizona says the importation of coconut oil is a great advantage to animal fats. He also says that the importations have not lessened in volume since the tax was imposed. If that is true, then the tax has had no effect on the importation. Importations have been coming in, so the Senator from Arizona says, all the time. If that is true, unless we get cheaper soap by the bar, who is it going to benefit except Procter & Gamble and a few other soap manufacturers in the United States? Mr. Procter and Mr. Gamble are the chief advocates of the repeal of this tax, because they have been before the Finance Committee, as will be testified by other members, repeatedly, not once but at many sessions of the Congress. They have made a regular groove in the marble floors in the Senate Office Building by walking back and forth to the Finance Committee.

Who is on the other side in this fight? The soap manufacturers are on one side. I read from the American Farm Bureau Federation. They are opposed to this amendment. They say it benefited vegetable fats in the United States. Who else is opposed to it? I have here resolutions from the American Cattle Raisers' Association. They are opposed to this amendment. I have here a resolution from the Domestic Fats and Oils Conference, whose slogan is to protect and further the production of domestic fats and oils until such production reaches our domestic requirements. They are against this amendment.

It is said that this tax has done no good. Let me say to you, Senators, that when the tax was originally adopted it resulted within a very short period of time in raising the price of domestic fats and oils in the United States. I know that in the case of cottonseed the price of cottonseed advanced from $18 a ton to practically $30 a ton within a very short time after the levying of this tax; and it had a similar effect on other vegetable and animal fats in the United States.

Oh, but it is said that if the fat is rendered inedible, if it is denatured, it will do no harm. Let me say to you that experts appearing before the Finance Committee have testified that many of these oils and fats are interchangeable by chemical treatment. For instance, tallow may be inedible, or it may be edible. The point is made in these articles that if the tallow that is being used for inedible purposes is driven from soap making by the use of so much coconut oil, it is driven into the edible class.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Is the Senator aware of the source of inedible tallow in the United States?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator means where it comes from?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; not entirely.

Mr. HAYDEN. I can tell the Senator where it comes from. Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. HAYDEN. It comes principally from garbage cans. That is what this whole fight is about. Of the 702,000,000 pounds of inedible tallow which is shown on the table the Senator from Texas has in his hand, over 500,000,000 pounds came out of garbage cans. It is tallow that was recovered in that manner. That is to say, those who collect it go to hotels and to hospitals and to chain stores, they go everywhere that they can pick up scraps of meat of any kind, to render the tallow out of it. That is where 70 percent of the inedible tallow comes from.

It is claimed that there is competition between coconut oil and the tallow that comes from garbage. I should like to have the Senator, if he will be kind enough, explain to me how any cattle grower in Arizona or any cattle grower in Texas is benefited by gathering up garbage and taking the tallow out of that garbage and sending it to market. When we sell a steer in Arizona or Texas we sell him on foot. We sell him at his meat price, and that is the way we get our price for him. If the meat scraps are gathered up afterward and the tallow is pressed out of them, and that tallow goes to market, if it is doing anything it is competing against our livestock industry.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not agree with that conclusion.

Mr. HAYDEN. I can prove conclusively that the great majority of the tallow that goes into soap is inedible, and it would continue to be inedible. If they attempted to put it into food they would violate every health law we have in the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know about the argument of the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I may be entirely wrong about this matter, but I am satisfied in my own mind that in the interruption the Senator from Arizona has just made he has been a little too harsh in calling this a garbage collection. My understanding differs somewhat from his. I do not believe it is right to say that this inedible tallow is taken out of a garbage can.

My understanding is that if the Senator from Texas should go into an ordinary butcher shop and buy some steak, the man who ran the butcher shop would weigh the steak. After he had weighed it he would cut off the ragged edges, he would cut off some tallow, and he would throw it not into the garbage can but into a receptacle containing it, being part of the steak which the Senator from Texas had purchased. A great deal of that tallow accumulates in the course of the day. I do not believe it is thrown into the garbage can. If the steak went to a hotel, and the hotel employees were going to prepare it for food in the dining room, they would probably cut off some more tallow. Perhaps the original butcher had left some straggling pieces on it. The hotel employees would cut off some more of the same steak that the Senator had bought and paid for, including the part of the steak that had been cut off which he did not get, and the hotel would accumulate that kind of material. The employees would not throw it into the It has some value. The butcher does not garbage can. throw it into the garbage can. It is purchased without ever going into a garbage can. I do not believe anybody goes around and locks over garbage cans and picks out anything that might be useful.

Mr. HAYDEN. Will the Senator agree, though, that once having been cast aside, that kind of fat should not again be made edible? That is the whole point.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be true or it may not be true. Some customers do not want any of the tallow cut off. They want it left on. They want it there when the steak is wrapped up, and in that case the butcher, of course, would leave it on; but the steak looks better without part of the tallow, it makes a nicer looking piece of meat, and most of the persons who purchase meat probably do not use that part of it. They themselves might throw it away. That might be true, but the tallow is not something that is confined to the garbage can because of any inferiority that it possesses. It is just as clean as the steak itself. It is accumulated by the butcher, and he sells it. After having once sold it as steak he sells it again.

I am only raising the point that the term "garbage can" has a harsh sound. I do not believe it is properly applied in this instance by the Senator from Arizona.

That is all I wanted to say.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator from Nebraska very much, because if the tallow is good when it came off the meat in the shop, when it is trimmed off, there is no reason why it should not be just as edible as the piece next to it that was left on the steak. I do not know how much of it goes into the garbage can; but that is beside the question.

Mr. President and Senators, I want to revert for just a moment to another matter. I do not see how any Senator can contend that this is not a revenue provision.

Allow me again to refer to the precedents:

Senator Spooner-

That was John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin-

Senator Spooner. Mr. President, I wish to say a word, and only a word, about this matter. I never supposed when the act was passed that the draw-back clause included wheat and some other items. But I cannot agree with the Senator from Alabama, and I do not quite agree with the Senator from Ohio, although I do not care to enter into a discussion of the question. I think the clause of the Constitution which says "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives" uses the word "raising" in a generic sense. I do not think it means simply raising duties. Oftentimes revenue is raised by lowering duties. I think it means in a strict sense, affecting revenue * * * concerning revenue. The Constitution does certainly confer upon the House by that clause an exclusive right, so far as this class of measures is concerned. Tariff bills cannot originate in the Senate. That is an impossibility.

This is an agricultural appropriation bill.

Then he proceeds at great length, and at the conclusion the RECORD states:

On motion of Mr. Spooner, the passage and engressment of the bill was reconsidered, and the objectionable amendment was disagreed to. The bill was then engressed, read a third time, and passed; and then returned to the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, I shall not weary the Senate with more questions; but if any Senator has any doubt about it being a revenue measure, I shall ask the Senator from Arizona, while he is on his feet, whether he does not regard this as a revenue measure.

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not, and I propose to tell the Senate why.

Mr. CONNALLY. It does not affect the revenue?

Mr. HAYDEN. It does not affect the revenue in the sense used in the Constitution. This is a constitutional question, and constitutional questions are determined by the courts.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no; we have a duty in that regard, as well as the courts.

Mr. HAYDEN. But this question has been raised a number of times in the courts—that bills raising revenue originated in the Senate and therefore were unconstitutional. I merely wish to read from a few Supreme Court decisions on that question. They are all based upon a statement made by Mr. Justice Story. This is what Mr. Story said—and I think he is a pretty good authority on the Constitution:

And, indeed, the history of the origin of the power already suggested abundantly proves that it has been confined to bills to levy taxes in the strict sense of the words, and has not been understood to extend to bills for other purposes which may incidentally create revenue.

Mr. CONNALLY. That was a bill affecting postage, was it not?

Mr. HAYDEN. This is Story on the Constitution.

Mr. CONNALLY. It was with respect to a bill in which the rates of postage were increased?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; this is Story on the Constitution.

Mr. CONNALLY. I know that-

Mr. HAYDEN. Then the Supreme Court quotes Mr. Story.
Mr. CONNALLY. I would rather the Senator would not take my time to read all those decisions.

Mr. HAYDEN. I understood the Senator yielded.

Mr. CONNALLY. I asked the Senator for his opinion, not Mr. Story's opinion. He says it is not a revenue measure.

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not think so.

Mr. CONNALLY. If it is not a revenue measure, and the Senator from Arizona says it is not a revenue measure, why does he provide for a repeal of the 3-cent tax? That is revenue, is it not? There is a domestic processing tax of 3 cents a pound. It has nothing on earth to do with anything in the Philippine Islands. The tax is levied, not when the article is imported, but after it comes to the United States and after it is processed in the United States. There is no matter relating to the internal affairs of the Philippine Islands, but it relates to a domestic, United States tax, and it takes the tax off.

Mr. President, I said the soap people were the ones who were making this argument. I have here a long printed argument, "Petition of soap industry to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs in support of the amendment of Senator Hayden relating to coconut oil. John B. Gordon, secretary." I will not read it all. Nobody is interested, so far as I can discover, except the soap manufacturers. Have they reduced the price of soap? They have not. Will they reduce the price of soap? They will not. We hear statements about lauric acid, it being said that no other oil contains any lauric acid except coconut oil. Very well. This pecconut oil is imported in the same volume with the tax or without the tax. If that be true, no one is hurt by the tax except the soap people, who want larger profits.

How much was it Procter & Gamble paid their president last year? There was some testimony before the Committee on Finance as to what they paid the president of the company. I cannot recall the figure now, but I shall check up on it and insert it in the Record. I am sure that Procter & Gamble's representative, who is in the gallery, will be glad to tell me about it when the session is over. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, the tax has resulted in benefit to domestic vegetable and animal fats. At least it has convinced the representatives of every farm organization I know of, such as the Grange and the American Farm Bureau Federation. The dairy representatives are here asking that this tax be retained; the representatives of the cattle associations are here asking that the tax be retained; the representatives of the fishing industry of the United States, who manufacture fish oil, are here asking that the tax be retained. It is now up to the Senate.

Mr. President, I shall insist on a vote on the point of order on the ground that this is an amendment affecting the revenue and therefore is not to be considered in the Senate but must originate in the House of Representatives.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, let us see what the effect would be if the Senate should adopt the amendment and it turns out to be an amendment affecting the revenue. Similar instances have happened a great many times in the history of this Government. The Senate, believing that it was acting within the Constitution, would pass a bill, and the House in its judgment would say we did not have a right to do it because it violated a provision of the Constitution. So they would send the bill back to us, and there would be no legislation unless it originated in the House.

In this case the House at least would have the advantage of knowing what the Senate thought about the legislation. No harm can come to anyone if we act favorably upon the amendment. No harm can come to the Senate. We cannot offend anyone. The most the House can do will be to say, "We will not consider the bill you sent over to us."

This whole constitutional provision in practice is more or less of a farce, as the Senator from Texas has pointed out. The House can pass any kind of a minor revenue bill, and we can attach a whole tariff bill to it, because the House has first acted on some item of revenue legislation.

I insist that this is not a revenue measure such as the House would object to, for the very good reason the Senator from Texas pointed out, except that he did not state all the facts. This is a revenue measure for the Philippine government, but not for our Government. I have the facts here. We have collected in 4 years, from 1935 to 1935, inclusive, $65,533,000, which we have sent back to the Philippine Islands. That is not American revenue, it is Philippine revenue which we collected and gave to them. The only kind of revenue that could be affected would be revenue which would go into our own Treasury.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am particularly anxious to get some information on that precise point.

Mr. HAYDEN. Very well.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand the pending bill is intended to stabilize the Philippine economy, to facilitate their safe independence ultimately. I also understand that the tax revenue the Senator is proposing to take away from them represents one-third of their budgetary income. I should like to know whether any consideration has been given to what this would do to the finances of the Philippine Islands, whether or not we would be unstabilizing them at one point when we were proposing to stabilize them at another.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator is mistaken in that respect, because the American collections of the 3-cent tax on coconut oil does not constitute one-third of the Philippine revenues. But that has nothing to do with the point of order. It only strengthens my objection to the point of order, in that it is Philippine revenue we are dealing with and not American revenue. What American revenue is affected by the amendment?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit further-

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me inquire whether any consideration has been given to the effect of this proposed repeal upon Philippine revenue.

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly I gave consideration to it, and, of course, I would not urge it if I thought it would result in wrecking the Philippine government. If the Philippine budget is to be balanced and kept in balance—as it has been; Frank Murphy attended to that when he was the Governor General over there-and if it depends upon our continuing to collect taxes from the American people in order to balance it, then I think it is time to consider whether we want to keep on taking money out of the pockets of our people to balance the Filipino budget.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Precisely, but that is a totally different matter.

Mr. HAYDEN. Not at all. The Philippine government has always raised sufficient revenue by taxing their own people.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is proposing an amendment to assist the Philippine Islands, but I want to know whether it assists them to take away one-third of their revenue.

Mr. HAYDEN. All I am proposing to do is to take away two-thirds of $16,000,000. One-third of the tax will continue to be collected on the coconut oil that is edible, which will amount to five or six million dollars to be remitted to the Philippine government. I am not proposing to disturb that, but I am proposing that the tax on the inedible oil be reduced. It means that instead of transmitting some $16,000,000 we will send five or six million to the Philippine Islands, a saving of $10,000,000 to the American people.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is now making the point that this is not a measure for raising revenue for the United States but for the Philippine Islands.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe it would be any less a revenue measure because we would, after we had collected the money, give it back to the Philippine Islands. The Government of the United States has to collect the revenue, it does everything just the same as it does with any other revenue, but after it has collected it, it uses it for a special purpose. The constitutional provision does not apply any more to that kind of a case than though we use the money for relief, or for general governmental purposes. In other words, the Senator makes the point that the Constitution does not apply to this kind of revenue because we are going to pay it to the Philippine Islands when we get it. It seems to me perfectly clear that it is still a revenue measure, regardless of what we do with the money when we collect it, and that, as a matter of the constitutionality of the particular provision, what we are going to do with the money after we get it has nothing to do with it.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am not a lawyer, but I am just looking at the question in a common-sense way, that if we are collecting a tax for the American people and giving it to the Philippine government, certainly it is not revenue which helps to maintain the American Government.

Mr. NORRIS. The Constitution does not provide it has to be revenue that will help to maintain the American Government. The Constitution imposes no limitation what-ever. It is our money after we collect it. We can do with it what we please. The Government collects the money just the same as though it were going to put it in its pocket. The fact that the measure which provides for levying the tax also contains a provision as to what shall be done with the money does not make it constitutional to originate the measure in the Senate, as I see it.

Mr. HAYDEN. There is a constitutional question here as to the tax collected from the other American possessions. There is a 3-cent tax collected on coconut oil which comes from Guam or from American Samoa. That amounted to an average of $188,000 a year. Then there is a 5-cent tax collected on coconut oil from all over the world which amounted to $65,000 a year. That makes a total of about $250,000 a year.

In my simple businessman way of reasoning things, if for every $1 of revenue that we lose $64 is collected and sent to the Philippines, it seems to me that this is not a revenue measure, and that we have to adopt a strictly legalistic definition of what is revenue if we do not look to the practical effect of where the money goes after we collect it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. HAYDEN. I yield. Mr. BARKLEY. The thing which bothers me in connection with this subject is the language of the Constitution itself, which does not seem to draw any distinction concerning what sort of a revenue bill it is, or what sort of a tax it is, or the purpose for which the money is to be expended. It simply says that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. If this is a bill for raising revenue, no matter what happens to the revenue after it is raised, I would feel that probably we had no jurisdiction to originate it.

Mr. HAYDEN. I should be inclined to agree with that statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. That raises the question whether a bill. one of whose purposes is something else than to raise revenue. but has revenue-raising provisions in it, still comes within the constitutional provision. I am afraid it does, to be perfectly frank with the Senator. Is it necessary to have these revenue provisions in the bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. Oh, yes. Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the trouble is that some of the revenue provisions were put in the original bill, and incidentally the original bill originated in the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator mean the original Philippine bill?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. That question may not have been raised. and the fact that it was not raised does not preclude it from being raised at any time in the future, if it is a good point.

I will say to the Senator that the other body has sometimes been a little squeamish with respect to its jurisdiction over revenue bills. I think sometimes there has been very serious doubt whether a bill was a revenue bill. Recently we had a discussion of that subject in connection with a measure which did not raise any revenue, but it proposed to amend a revenue bill, and amend it in an entirely different particular. It had nothing to do with revenue. But the House took the position that inasmuch as it was an amendment to a bill which originated in the House, and carried revenue provisions, although our amendment did not touch the revenue, it was still outside of our jurisdiction to inaugurate.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, here is the case of the Twin City Bank v. Nebeker (167 U. S. 196), a case which was passed on by the Supreme Court of the United States. I will not read the whole opinion. At one point it says:

It is sufficient in the present case to say that an act of Congress providing a national currency secured by a pledge of bonds of the United States, and which, in the furtherance of that object, and also to meet the expenses attending the execution of the act, imposed a tax on the notes in circulation of the banking associations organized under the statute, is clearly not a revenue bill. * * * a revenue bill.

The bill levied a tax to raise revenue, but it was not a revenue bill. The primary purpose of the pending bill is to adjust the differences between the United States and the Philippines in their commercial relations.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not true that in the case from which the Senator just read the primary purpose was to regulate the bank, and as an incident to the service they levied a fee or charge on these notes, just the same as in the case of the bank examiner who comes around and examines the banks, for which a charge is made? that is not revenue. That is not the purpose of the legislation at all. It is just an incident in the execution of the general regulatory power. But here they boldly and openly and defiantly urge that the legislation is for the purpose of affecting the revenues.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The very object of the amendment is to change the revenues, is it not?

Mr. HAYDEN. No, Mr. President. The object of the amendment, as I see it, is to avoid taking money away from the American people and giving it to the Philippines.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but in order to do that a change in the revenue law must be effected.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I may call attention to the wording of Subsection (a) (1) of section 2470 of the Internal Revenue ode * * * is hereby amended. Code

The Senator in terms is proposing to amend the revenue act of the country, and of course it affects the revenue.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. I think if the bill goes back to the House with this amendment it will not be the only objection to it, because the same thing was done, as has been pointed out, in other places of the bill. We cannot get into the broad subject of the relationship between the United States and the Philippine Islands without in some manner changing a tariff or a revenue law, and if we are to take this view then no legislation can be initiated in the Senate at all. It has to be begun only in the House.

Mr. BORAH. That might very well be true, but the Senate could not initiate the legislation with regard to the Philippines if the legislating in regard to the Philippines changed the revenues of the country. That would have to be done in the House. The control with respect to the question is whether or not you are dealing with the question of revenue, and if you stick it onto another bill dealing with any other kind of a proposal my opinion is that with the experience we have had here the House will send it back.

Mr. HAYDEN. What harm would it be?
Mr. BORAH. There would be no harm if they sent this bill back.

Mr. HAYDEN. After all, it will not do a bit of harm. If out of perhaps an excess of enthusiasm for some subject we pass a bill and the House does not like it, they do not have to pass it. We have the same privilege here with respect to bills originating in the House. It is a mere formality.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; we are sworn to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States. The Senator cannot regard it as a formality.

Mr. HAYDEN. I would not. And as a matter of fact I do not think that we are in any way affecting the Federal revenues in the present case.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. SMATHERS. Will the Senator indulge me with an explanation as to who will be benefited if we remove the tax? Will the resulting benefit be passed on to the consuming public, or will it go to the soap manufacturers?

Mr. HAYDEN. The statement has been made, and I have seen it in all this lobbyist literature which has been sent to Senators, that when this tax was imposed the price of soap was not increased in the United States. The best evidence that such statements are not true was what was brought out in the hearings on the tax on fats and oils before the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate. Here are charts made by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor, showing the wholesale prices of soaps, and in each case, after the tax was levied, the price of soap was increased. If the Senator will look on pages 344, 345, 346, and 347 of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Finance he will see that in every case after 1934 the price of soap of every kind in the United States went up. Why did it go up? Because the manufacturers had to pay more for their coconut oil.

The Senator from Texas mentioned Procter & Gamble. The only person connected with Procter & Gamble I ever talked to was their attorney, who happened to be on the ship with me when I went to the Philippine Islands-Mr. Frank Dinsmore from Cincinnati.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator understands that I did not make any intimation of anything improper.

Mr. HAYDEN. No; I understand that, but I stated where I received the information. He said that so far as Procter & Gamble was concerned, with the wide advertising that they had of Ivory Soap, it was a matter of indifference to them whether this tax was on or off, because they were going to use the coconut oil anyhow, and they would add the tax to the cost of the Ivory Soap. That is exactly what they have done, and the proof of it is these charts from the Bureau of Labor Statistics, showing that after the tax was levied the price of all kinds of soap in the United States did go up.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. That was the wholesale price, was it not?

Mr. HAYDEN. Surely.

Mr. CONNALLY. Here is some testimony also on that subject before the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate. Someone representing the farm group testified as

However, one of the remarkable things about the soap industry, one of the mysterious things, is that from 1926 through and including 1928 the price of laundry soap has not varied as much as a cent a pound. For each of the years 1934, 1935, 1936—

The years given in the testimony must have been 1936 and

Mr. HAYDEN. Who was the witness?

Mr. CONNALLY. I think it was Mr. Loomis.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Loomis is the lobbyist who represents those who gather inedible fats from the garbage cans.

Mr. CONNALLY. He represents all those who deal in fats. Mr. HAYDEN. No; his principal clients are those who gather up the scraps of fats throughout the United States. They are the people who are paying Mr. Loomis.

Mr. CONNALLY. I cannot agree to that. But I know he is not on the soap end of it, because he fights the soap people.

Mr. HAYDEN. I read that testimony by Mr. Loomis and then called up the Bureau of Labor Statistics in the Department of Labor, and said, "I have seen this remarkable statement that there was no increase in the price of soap after the excise tax on coconut oil was imposed. That statement has been repeated by a number of agricultural leaders. How could that be?" They told me that they could not understand it, because there had been increases in the price of soap, both wholesale and retail, since 1934. So the Senator is quoting a very unreliable witness.

Mr. CONNALLY. I know the testimony will not suit the Senator. This is what it says:

For each of the years 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937, and 1938 the official price quotation was 4.067 cents per 11-ounce cake.

I presume that is the retail price. When one goes to the store and buys one cake of soap it costs him, on an average, 4.067 cents. At any rate it is the official price.

During those years the prices of the materials, both the hard fats and the soft fats, have varied considerably with the producers. At the same time laundry soap prices have not varied materially from 1929 to 1938.

This large soap company-Procter & Gamble-has made substantial profits ranging from $19,000,000 in 1929 down to a low of nine-million-and-odd dollars in 1932, up to a possible high of $26,803,000 in 1937, and back to $17,439,000 in 1938.

I shall not consume more of the time of the Senate at this moment.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. In connection with the statement just made by the Senator from Texas, let me give the prices of coconut oil since 1930. Before I do, let me say that coconut oil enjoys a special freight rate. I quote freight rates on vegetable oils in carload lots:

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana vield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not have the floor. In just a moment I will be through with my questions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] has the floor. Does the Senator from Arizona yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HAYDEN. I shall be very glad to have such prices put into the RECORD.

Mr. ELLENDER. The coconut-oil prices from 1930 to 1938, per pound, are as follows: 1930, 7.3 cents; 1931, 5.3 cents; 1932, 4.5 cents; 1933, 4.2 cents; 1934, 3.9 cents; 1935, 4.7 cents; 1936, 5.3 cents; 1937, 6.3 cents; and in 1938, 3.4 cents. I ask the Senator from Arizona what fluctuation there has been in the price of soap from 1930 to 1938. With such variations in price soap should have sold much cheaper at times, but I wager the record shows no variation in prices.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I hope the Senator will not think I am captious, or desire to cut off the argument. However, it seems to me the question whether the amendment is good or bad has no place in this argument.

Mr. HAYDEN. I agree. Mr. TYDINGS. Obviously, until we decide whether or not the amendment is a revenue measure, the other argument is incidental. If it is decided that it is not a revenue measure, then the arguments pro and con can properly be presented. However, if it is decided that it is a revenue measure, and not properly in the bill, we shall have consumed in debating the merits much time which we might otherwise save. I was only going to suggest-with an apology, of course-that if Senators care to discuss the merits of the constitutional question, that is one thing. However, we are not getting anywhere when we discuss the merits of the proposal as detached from the constitutional question.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I entirely agree with what the Senator from Maryland has said. I would not have gone outside the constitutional argument except that certain statements were made which are not in accord with the facts as I understand them to be.

Mr. ELLENDER. Should the point of order made by the Senator from Texas be not maintained. I desire to further discuss the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HAYDEN subsequently said: Mr. President, during the course of my remarks I promised to insert certain tables in the RECORD. I should like permission to do so, and to have them printed as exhibits at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The tables referred to are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE. BUREAU OF THE CENSUS, Washington, March 18, 1939.

FACTORY CONSUMPTION OF ANIMAL AND VEGETABLE FATS AND OILS, BY CLASSES OF PRODUCTS, FOR 1938

The distribution of primary animal and vegetable fats and oils consumed in factory operations in the United States during the calendar year 1938, by classes of products in which used, is presented in the tabular statement below. Data for oleo stock were not collected; hence the secondary products, edible animal stearin, and oleo oil are shown. The statistics were compiled from the quarterly reports of the several concerns to the Bureau of the Census, supplemented by special statements covering the entire year for those manufacturing more than one class of products.

The total consumption in all industries for each item is the same as given in the bulletin for 1938, except for those vegetable oils for which the crude and refined products are indicated in the questionnaire, namely, cottonseed, peanut, coconut, corn, soybean, palm-kernel, palm, and babassu oils. For each of these a net consumption was arrived at by deducting from the total of both crude and refined consumed the quantity of refined produced.

Oils subjected to the process of hydrogenation or other treatment for special uses were reported as consumed in the products for which intended. For example, oils treated for soap manufacture were entered in the column headed "Soap" and oils intended for edible purposes were entered in one or more of the columns covering edible products. The ultimate uses of the primary oils are designated in this way.

NOTE.-Computed from table 8.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I wish to fortify, if I can, the position of the Senator from Arizona. I will say by way of preface that I am not accustomed to argue constitutional questions. I am not a constitutional expounder. I have generally found in my experience that, according to the courts, if we may place any reliance upon them, the most eloquent expounders of the Constitution are usually decided to be in error.

The latest edition of the Constitution of the United States of America, annotated—oh, it is a presumptuous thing to be referring to the Constitution here-contains notes under the various headings. I will read the notes for what they are worth. I shall not attempt to comment upon them in any way, shape, form, or manner. Other Senators can understand them as well as I can, although they may understand them differently:

SEC. 7. All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.

The note says:

All bills for raising revenue: The construction of this limitation is practically settled by the uniform action of Congress confining it to bills to levy taxes in the strict sense of the word, and it has not been understood to extend to bills having some other legitimate and well-defined general purpose but which incidentally

Under that particular text the following cases are cited: United States v. Norton (91 U. S. 566), Twin City National Bank v. Nebeker (167 U. S. 196), Millard v. Roberts (202 U.S. 429).

Amendments by Senate: It has been held within the power of the Senate to remove from a revenue collection bill originating in the House a plan of inheritance taxation and substitute therefor a corporation tax.

The following cases are cited: Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. (220 U. S. 107), Rainey v. United States (232 U. S. 310).

That is all.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I have not had the opportunity to read the decisions cited by the Senator from California; but there is no difficulty in that regard. As I understand the rule and the precedents, the language of the Constitution provides that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House. However, the Senate, of course, may amend them. When a revenue bill comes to the Senate, the Senate is at liberty, if it desires, to adopt a new tax which is not even contained in the House bill, because it has complete legislative powers, except for the prchibition that it shall not originate the bill.

If the doctrine asserted by Senators on the floor is sound, then the Senate need never pay attention to the constitutional provision about revenue measures, because when any bill comes over from the House a Senator may offer on the floor of the Senate an amendment cutting down the taxation, as this bill does, and say that it does not raise any revenue, and is therefore in order. The bill immediately becomes subject to amendment, and another Senator may offer an amendment raising the revenue, or adding a new tax, thus rendering absolutely nugatory the constitutional provision.

There was a reason for the constitutional provision that revenue bills should originate in the House. The theory was that the Members of the House of Representatives are representatives of the people, and that Senators are representatives of the States, formerly being elected by the legislatures of the States. The old theory, upon which the Revolution itself was founded, was that taxation without representation was cause for revolution. Therefore, the makers of the Constitution wisely provided that no tax should be laid upon the backs of the people unless their Representatives in the House of Representatives should propose the bill seeking to levy the tax; but the Constitution says that when that bill comes to the Senate the Senate may amend it, or change it, or do what it pleases with it, once the House has opened the door.

We have before us a bill which did not even originate in the House. The whole bill originated in the Senate. It is now proposed to take off a tax. It does not make any difference whether the bill raises or lowers the tax; it is still a revenue measure. It still relates to the revenue. I could offer in a moment an amendment raising the tax, instead of repealing the 3-cent tax, as is proposed. I could offer an amendment to make it 5 cents. Such an amendment would be in order. Then we should unquestionably have a bill raising revenue.

Mr. President, we ought not to adopt the pending amendment. I think everyone ought to know that it is violative of the spirit of comity, good will, and respect for the prerogatives of the two Houses. We ought not to add a revenue measure by a committee amendment.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] says that because the money ultimately goes to the Philippines, the bill is not a revenue bill. How does the money go to the Philippines? The Government of the United States first levies the tax. Whose tax? The tax of the United States. Who is the collector? The United States' collector goes out and collects it at the factory where the processing is done. We are not concerned with what becomes of the money after it goes into the Treasury. The bill is still a revenue measure. Whether we appropriate the money to the Treasury of the Philippines or whether we give it to the W. P. A. does not change or modify the fact that it is a revenue measure. We would never get a dollar of the money into the Treasury of the United States unless the United States first exacted it by law, and then extorted it from the taxpayer by its own collection. There is no concern whatever as to what becomes of the dollar. We do not earmark every dollar that goes into the Treasury. We levy the tax, and it is up to the Congress to appropriate the proceeds.

So, Mr. President, that argument is specious; it is transparent. It is an argument through which even the dullest mind ought to be able to pierce.

Mr. President, I shall not consume more time. If the pending bill is not a revenue measure, then there are no revenue

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the committee amendment. For the information of the Senate, the committee amendment will be stated.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it. Mr. BARKLEY. Has the Chair stated the point which is to be voted on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state it presently. For the information of the Senate, the Chair wishes to have the committee amendment stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 19, line 24, it is proposed by the committee to insert:

(f) Section (a) (1) of section 2470 of the Internal Revenue Code (I. R. C., ch. 21, sec. 2470 (a) (1)), is hereby amended by striking out the comma after the words "coconut oil," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "(Except coconut oil rendered unfit for use as food or for any but mechanical or manufacturing purposes as provided in paragraph 1732 of the Tariff Act of 1930), and upon the first domestic processing of."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To the committee amendment which has just been stated, the Senator from Texas has raised a point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I should like to express myself briefly respecting the point of order made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. Connally]. Frequently the Committee on Finance has been compelled to refuse to report bills which a majority of the committee favored, because it was felt that those proposals involved revenue legislation and should originate in the other House. I have no doubt, so far as this particular amendment is concerned, that should this bill pass the Senate with the committee amendment included, the House could reject or return it if it desired to do so. I may be mistaken, but I believe the amendment involves a revenue matter, and it seems to me that we should not send this bill to the House under these circumstances and that the Senate should sustain the point of

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To the committee amendment the Senator from Texas raised the point of order that the committee amendment is itself a revenue measure and may not originate in the Senate. The question now occurs, Is the committee amendment in order? Those Senators who think it is in order will vote "aye"; those who think the point of order is well taken will vote "no."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is not the question whether the point of order is well taken, on which those who believe it well taken will vote "aye"?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair will say that he entertains the same idea as that of the Senator from Kentucky, but he submitted the question to the Parliamentarian, and the Parliamentarian advised the occupant of the chair that the better practice is to submit the question, "Is the committee amendment in order?" Therefore, so that it may be understood, the Chair will repeat the question, Is the committee amendment in Those who think it is in order will vote "aye," and those who think it is not in order will vote "no." [Putting the question.] By the sound, the "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask for a division.

Mr. HARRISON, Mr. BARKLEY, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and navs were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the Senate is voting upon the point of order, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.
Mr. JOHNSON of California. There was no decision rendered by the Chair upon the point of order, was there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair ruled, under the precedents of the Senate, the constitutional question being raised that it was a question to be decided by the Senate, and the Chair did not rule on the constitutional question.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Chair is safe, then. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair seems to be safe on such a vote. The clerk will proceed to call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass]. I find that if he were present and voting he would vote as I have voted. So I let my vote stand.

Mr. McNARY. The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Davis], the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. Holman], and the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Tobey] are absent on official business. If present, each of the Senators mentioned would vote "nay."

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Bridges] is absent because of an operation.

Mr. BYRD. My colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass] is detained from the Senate because of illness. I am advised that if he were present and at liberty to vote he would vote "nay."

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Balley] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Gil-LETTE] are absent on important public business. I am advised that if present and at liberty to vote those Senators would vote "nay."

The Senator from Florida [Mr. Andrews], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh] are detained in important committee meetings.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Brown], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Guffey], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SCHWARTZ] are absent on important public business.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Chavez], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Donahey], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Gerry], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Herring], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Hill], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lucas], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Overton], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Van Nuys] are detained on departmental business.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Holf] is addressing the East Fairmont High School Alumni Association today, and is therefore necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 8, nays 54, as follows:

So the Senate decided the committee amendment to be out of order

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I think that disposes of all committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendments have been disposed of. The bill is still before the Senate and is open to further amendment. Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I send forward an amendment which I ask to have stated. I may say that this amendment was not adopted by the committee as a committee amendment, but I have submitted it to nearly all the members of the committee since it was prepared. I gave notice of it in the committee, and it has the approval of the majority of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 15, after line 2, it is proposed to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 4. Section 13 of the said act of March 24, 1934, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 13. After the Philippine Islands have become a free and "Sec. 13. After the Philippine Islands have become a free and independent nation there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands the rates of duty which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from other foreign countries: Provided, That at least 2 years prior to the date fixed in this act for the independence of the Philippine Islands, there may be held a conference of representatives of the Government of the United States and the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, the representatives of the United States to consist of three United States Senators, appointed by the President of the Senate, three Members of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker of the House, House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker of the House, and six persons appointed by the President of the United States; and six persons appointed by the President of the United States; a like number of representatives of the Philippine government may be appointed by the President of the Philippine Commonwealth, with the consent of the commission on appointments; the purpose of the conference shall be to formulate recommendations as to future trade relations between the Government of the United States and the independent government of the Philippine Islands, the time, place, and manner of holding such conference to be determined by the President of the United States; but nothing in this proviso shall be construed to modify or affect in any way any provision of this act relating to the procedure leading up to Philippine independence or the date upon which the Philippine Islands shall become independent.

"In the event any vacancy may occur by reason of the death, resignation, or retirement from the House of Representatives of any Member appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives such vacancy may be filled by appointment of the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"Any vacancy which may occur in the portion of the commission appointed by the President of the United States may be filled by appointment of the President of the United States."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, purely on the grounds of consistency-I really do not know what is in this amendment-I shall have to make the same point of order that I made on the other one, because on its face the amendment discloses that it is a revenue proposition.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, let me say to my friend from Texas that the sentence to which he refers makes no change in existing law by even as much as one word.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then it is not a question of existing law at all. If it is existing law, there is no use to reenact it; but on its face the amendment provides that when and if the Philippines become independent and free, certain tariff rates shall be levied on all articles coming into the United States. If that is not a tariff bill, I do not know what a tariff bill is.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Texas that that provision is in existing law; and the purpose of the amendment is to add to existing law a proviso which does not affect the revenue in any particular whatever. The provision of existing law was set out in order to make the proviso intelligible.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I do not recall the language of the original law; but, as I listened to the reading of this amendment, it provides that this commission shall meet for the purpose of fixing tariff rates.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The amendment gives the Commission no authority whatever to fix tariff rates. As has been contemplated in the law from the very beginning of the consideration of the question of independence, the amendment simply sets up a body for the consideration of any economic questions which may arise prior to the Independence Act going into effect. It does not give the Commission the slightest authority to change existing rates or to provide for any new rates.

Mr. BORAH. What is the purpose of the Commission? What is its objective?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In the process of economic separation certain questions may and undoubtedly will arise, and the amendment simply sets up a commission having jurisdiction, if the President sees fit to appoint them-it is not mandatory-to study these questions, and, of course, to report to the Congress. That is what it would be necessary for the Commission to do, of course.

Mr. BORAH. The only power the Commission would have ultimately would be to report to Congress?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Absolutely.

I will say very frankly, so far as I am concerned, that my purpose in offering the amendment is to have some commission authorized by law to take the matter under consideration, rather than an entirely extralegal committee such as has been set up without any authorization by law. We have had an interdepartmental committee. I think the President should have authority to appoint representatives on this commission, I also think there should be on it representatives from Congress to take into consideration matters which may arise prior to the final separation already The amendment does not provided for by existing law. give them the slightest authority to change law. It simply authorizes them to take the matters into consideration, and, of course, to report to the Congress, and whatever determination the Congress may see fit to make will be final.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. Under existing law when and if the Philippines become free, do the tariff rates under the present law immediately apply as they do to all other countries, or do the Philippines enjoy a scaling-down process?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When they have complete independence, I understand that they pay duty like anybody else.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator does not know-Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is my understanding of the law. If any Senator has a contrary view, I shall be glad to have him state it. This amendment does not change existing law. It is not the purpose of the amendment to change existing law.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is not a matter of whether the amendment changes existing law or whether it does not; it deals with the revenue, because it says:

Section 13. After the Philippine Islands have become a free and independent nation there shall be levied-

By whom? By the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is already the law.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then there is no need to reenact it-there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands the rates of duty which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from other foreign countries.

If that is not a tariff bill, I do not know what a tariff bill

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator from Texas desires to be so technical—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator will yield, I will take the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas does not appreciate comments such as the Senator from Missouri makes when he says, "If the Senator wants to be so technical." I do not care anything about his amendment and did not know what was in it until it was read. I had just made a point of order on the same grounds on an amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and the Senate sustained me.

Can I sit here now and, simply because the Senator from Missouri offers an amendment that is also objectionable, not make the point of order against him when I have made it against one of the best friends I have in the world, the Senator from Arizona? And then, because the Senator from Texas does that, he is "technical."

When the Senator from Texas takes an oath to obey the Constitution of the United States, he takes an oath to obey all of it, not just the part that suits him, not just the part that suits the Senator from Missouri, not just the part that suits the views of the Senator from Texas as to some particular measure, but he takes an oath to support all of it, whether it suits him or not. If the Senator from Missouri wants to call that technical, I shall plead guilty; I am technical.

I have seen the Senator from Missouri stand here and heard him exhort Senators to stand up for the Constitution when that view suited him. I am surprised that he should relax in his vigilance over that sacred document at any time or for any purpose. I commend it to him. Go back and look at the old document. It is over here in the Library of Congress, if the Senator has not seen it lately. Go over there and look at it, meditate on it, become saturated with it, and then the Senator will not say that someone who is insisting on observance is merely technical.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I repeat the statement that the Senator from Texas is not only technical but is wrong.

If it suits the peculiar mentality of the Senator from Texas to insist that it is a violation of any constitutional provision to insert in a Senate amendment a repetition of the existing law, now upon the statute books, without a change of any single letter in that law, for the purpose of making more clear a proviso which does not refer to the revenue being appended to that section of existing law, I am perfectly content for the Senator from Texas to maintain such a position.

If the Senator from Texas conceives that it would be a violation of his oath of office, as being a violation of the Constitution of the United States, to include in a bill a repetition of existing law, I desire to relieve the Senator from the necessity of making a point of order, although I am thoroughly convinced that there is no merit whatever in the point

If the Senator from Texas conceives that the point of order which he could make against this amendment would be the one which he has just made against the amendment of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], I am perfectly willing for him to labor under that delusion.

Therefore, Mr. President, I modify my amendment by striking out the words beginning on line 1, of page 1, down to and including the word "Provided", on line 1, of page 2, and the word "that", on line 2, of page 2, so that the amendment will begin:

At least 2 years prior to the date fixed in this act-

And the remainder of the amendment will be as it has been read.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, with the elimination the Senator from Missouri has made in his amendment, the objection made by the Senator from Texas would, of course, no longer hold; and I am sure the Senator from Texas does not want to make an objection to the remainder of the amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. When the vice I perceive in the amendment is taken out, of course I have no further objection to it. Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President-

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I desire to state very specifically that the modification makes no reference whatever to the merits of the objection made by the Senator from Texas, but is merely to satisfy the mind of the Senator from Texas, and keep him from reading the Constitution again.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator from Missouri for this soulful solace he gives to the Senate.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, as it now stands, is not mandatory, but permissive. Nevertheless, before the Senate votes on it, and I have no particular objection to it. I think we might consider where we will be when the amendment really becomes operative.

The amendment now reads:

Provided, that at least 2 years prior to the date fixed in this act for independence-

Which would be 1944there may be held-

Not "shall be held," butthere may be held a conference.

Then it proceeds to provide that the conferees shall bechosen from the Senate and the House. At this time I' cannot see any particular reason why perhaps just before independence there might not be a conference of Representatives and Senators to see what the situation might then be and to take such necessary steps as it might demand. But between now and 1944 two Presidents of the United States will be elected, an entirely new Senate will be elected, and there will be three new Houses of Representatives. I do not know whether in 1944 I would be glad that a conference would go into this matter again. If we have to have a conference 2 years before final independence takes place, I think it is pretty sound to provide that Congress as then existing shall put into force such a conference to hear any matter which may need to be considered, and certainly if tne Philippine people wanted to petition Congress for some change which we do not now perceive to be necessary, they could do so.

True, the amendment makes it only permissive; it is not mandatory. But I think there is much force in the thought that we should not now make provision for this conference. Congress may not want to have a conference at that time. Certainly if the act takes care pretty reasonably of the things which may happen prior to independence, we may not want to have another consideration of the Philippine situation. But if we put this amendment into the law, I am afraid it will be interpreted to mean a promise which Congress will make good 2 years before independence. We may want to do it when the date arrives, or we may want to do it 3 years or 4 years before the independence of the Philippines is to come about. I think the Senate and the country ought to know that, even though the amendment is permissive, it might be interpreted as committing Congress to a certain procedure 2 years before final independence. I believe that thought ought to be in the minds of Senators when they vote upon the amendment. I am not particularly speaking against the amendment, but I think the implications of the amendment ought to be understood if the Senate cares to adopt it.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland whether it is not the present law that there is to be a trade conference to be held at least 1 year prior to July 4, 1946?

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not think that is accurate.

Mr. DANAHER. What is the provision of law in that respect?

Mr. TYDINGS. I think it is permissive.

Mr. DANAHER. It does provide that there may be one at least 1 year prior to July 4, 1946?

Mr. TYDINGS. I would not care to say; I have not read that part of the law for a long time. It may be in the law, or it may not be.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it is in the law except for a change in the date when the conference is to be held, the law does provide for it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Missouri would make it pretty definite that the Congress is to constitute a certain number of Members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate to consider this matter 2 years before independence. There might be a world war before that time; there might be another war in the Orient. The whole situation might be changed. It seems to me we might be well advised to wait until 1943 or 1944 to see what the situation may then be. Certainly if there is any need for dealing with this question again, I am sure Congress will deal with it through its appropriate committees. But to make this gesture now, before we know what may happen in the next 4 or 5 years, might be a mistake. I have no particular objection to the amendment, except that I am concerned that it will be misinterpreted by the Filipino people as a demand on their part for a conference which we will have to accept in good faith.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, let me point out the provision in existing law:

That at least 1 year prior to the date fixed in this act for the independence of the Philippine Islands there shall be held a conference of representatives of the Government of the United States and the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, such representatives to be appointed by the President of the United States and the chief executive of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, respectively, for the purpose of formulating recommendations as to future trade relations between the Government of the United States and the independent government of the Philippine Islands.

The advantage I see in the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri is that instead of being mandatory it is permissive.

Mr. TYDINGS. From what act is the Senator reading?

Mr. HAYDEN. I am reading from section 13 of the act of March 24, 1934.

Mr. TYDINGS. Not from the pending bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; I am reading from the law.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then, if the Senator's position is well taken, unless that law shall be repealed, that conference will be provided for and also the conference proposed in the pending amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. But the Senator from Missouri proposes to amend this language in the existing law.

Mr. TYDINGS. The amendment does not so state. I have the amendment in my hand. It says nothing about amending.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It provided, "Section 13 of the said act of March 24, 1934, is hereby amended."

Mr. HAYDEN. That is the act from which I have been reading.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am in error.

Mr. HAYDEN. I think it is highly advantageous that there be on the commission provided for, Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. Congress has had much to say about all of the Philippine legislation enacted heretofore. We have not turned it over to the executive department.

The Senator from Missouri improved the situation, first, by making the amendment permissive; secondly, by making it effective 2 years before independence, instead of 1, because if we are to do anything about it, 1 year is too short a time; thirdly, he improved the situation by providing representation on the commission of Senators and Representatives.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am very much in accord with the position taken by the Senator from Arizona. There is now what is called an Interdepartmental Commission. It consists of representatives of five of the departments. As a matter of fact, only one department is represented, and only one man in one department pays very much attention to the Commission, so far.

If the law remains as it is, there will probably be one representative of the six departments in the Philippine Islands negotiating, we will say, a bill with regard to the future of the Philippine Islands after they become independent. The Congress of the United States will probably know nothing about what the proposal is until it is submitted within a few months or a few days before the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands is to die and the Philippine Islands become absolutely sovereign. Then the Congress of the United States will be expected to act on the matter immediately, because of it being an emergency, something being about to happen. The privileges granted the Philippine Islands under the Commonwealth Act will expire, and we will be urged to act immediately. We will either act without knowledge or we will take considerable time in studying the question, while possibly the Philippine Islands will be suffering.

It seems to me it is one of those peculiar cases of the responsibility as to what we should do in the Philippine Islands after they become sovereign resting upon the Congress of the United States. I think there should be Members of both branches of the Congress, in equal numbers with those representing the executive department, who should be prepared to give a full report to the Congress before the period of sovereignty commences, and the report should be rendered from the standpoint of Congress, not from the standpoint of some executive commission.

Mr. President, I very strongly support the pending suggestion, and I ask, of course, that it be certain that the provision in the act for a conference, which is for a purely departmental conference, is repealed by the amendment. I want it to be understood that it is.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, that is certainly the purpose of the amendment, and I understand it repeals the former provision. The amendment as originally drawn was printed 10 days ago and has been available to members of the committee since that time. In the original print the provisions were mandatory instead of permissive, and I say very frankly that I much prefer to have them mandatory instead of permissive; but the amendment was changed today at the suggestion of the chairman of the committee. I understood that made the amendment meet with the complete approval of the chairman of the committee. Otherwise, I should not have changed the amendment to make it permissive instead of mandatory.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator about the very question he is now discussing. Under the present law a mandatory commission is provided for, which will not be composed of Members of Congress. The Senator's amendment would repeal that provision.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. My amendment would repeal it. Mr. NORRIS. It provides for Members of the House and Senate being on the commission. I think that is a great improvement; I like it very much; but I do not like the provision which does not make the conference mandatory.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. As I have stated, I prefer a mandatory provision.

Mr. NORRIS. The law as it now reads is mandatory, and there was reason for that. I suppose most Senators feel there should be a conference, and if the Senator's amendment is not adopted, there may never be a conference. Nothing may be done.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I am very much in favor of making it mandatory.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to know if the chairman of the committee has any objection to making it mandatory.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have no objection whatsoever to making it mandatory. If the Senate wants to do so, I certainly do not want to interpose any objection. I did tell the Senator from Missouri that I did not like the amendment to start with, but I did not dislike it so much if it was permissive rather than mandatory.

From previous contacts with this problem, I am of the opinion that this provision is going to be misinterpreted. I believe that it will be used as a vehicle to bring up the whole question all over again. And, while I think I have shown a pretty fair disposition toward the Filipino government and the people to meet every reasonable request so far as I could, so far as I have any voice, I do not like to have in the measure a provision which would enable the Filipinos to look to 1944 as a definite date, when changes affecting them might be made.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to call attention to this provision:

But nothing in this proviso shall be construed to modify or affect in any way any provision of this act relating to the procedure leading up to Philippine independence or the date upon which the Philippine Islands shall become independent.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator is well aware that that is the one provision I have insisted from the very beginning should be inserted in any bill that might be passed, in order that there may be no doubt whatever in the minds of the Filipino people or the American people that we are going to carry through the act of independence heretofore enacted.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want such doubt to exist. I should like to answer the Senator from Nebraska a little more in detail.

Mr. NORRIS. Before the Senator does that, may I submit to him also that under existing law, if we agree to no amendment, there is bound to be a commission?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true, but it would be a departmental commission and would not bind the Congress. I am not going to mention any names, and I hope I will not violate any confidences, but I may suggest to the Senator that there are a good many people interested in the Philippine problem in this country and in the Philippines who are looking for the day when this particular act will be used only as a means of translating what we assume now is going to be an ultimate independence of the Philippines into a dominion status of the Philippines similar to that of Canada with relation to Great Britain. I know that that is so from many contacts.

Mr. NORRIS. If that is so, and the Senator wants to avoid that, we would have to repeal that portion of the law which would not be repealed by the amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. So it really comes down to whether we are going to have a commission at all, and if we are not going to have a commission we must repeal the law which provides for one. So after all, does it not come down to this proposition: That it is a question whether the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is better than existing law?

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not know but what it is. As I say, I am not going to object to it, but I want to make my own position clear, in even mildly being for it, that, so far as I am concerned, I am in favor of complete independence of the Philippine Islands, with no strings tied to it, as soon as we can decently and humanely, morally, financially, and economically bring it about.

Mr. NORRIS. I am, too.

Mr. TYDINGS. I know the Senator is. And, insofar as my position is concerned, and I believe the position of Congress, I do not want any of these proposed conferences which are to be held sometime in the future to be seized upon by any source in this Government or out of it, as indicating that basically the policy upon which we are now embarked of Filipino independence is going to be altered by the Congress, so far as we now know.

I am aware that certain persons here and there are hoping that gradually this whole policy can be veered into another direction; that the Filipino people will realize what a difficult time they will have ahead of them as a free nation; that with some countries nearby being warlike, and the Philippines no longer having a free market, their whole economy must pass through an evolution; that dictatorial powers may be necessary to maintain law and order. Therefore, with all these things in mind, people who at first were in favor of independence now want to retreat, not to retreat back to the old status but they want a governor and a dominion form of government.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In other words, they want to have their cake and eat it, too.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is perfectly true, and it is understandable why there should now be signs of a change in viewpoint in the Philippine Islands. Personally I am sorry that the conference provision was put in the original act. If the original act were pending before the Senate today I believe I should offer an amendment to eliminate the conference provisions; not that we would not consider any petition which the Philippine people might file with Congress; not that we would not give them a hearing; not that we would not meet them half way in respect of any complaint they might have, or any difficulty that might be ahead, but because of the certainty of numerous conflicts, and knowing that there are those in the Congress who think the Filipinos ought not to have their independence in the first place, and knowing there are now those in the Philippines who perhaps asked for freedom, but who now are beginning to look at it in a little different way, I am afraid in view of changed world conditions that such a conference might be used in a future Congress as a vehicle again to attach the Philippines to our country. For my part I want to get out of the Philippines at the earliest possible moment consonant with what may be called fair dealing between the two peoples.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Maryland and to the Senate that I am certainly as thoroughly committed and as thoroughly in favor of the proposition of the United States getting out of the Philippines at the earliest possible moment as anyone could pos-The Senator from Maryland will recall that sibly be. throughout the hearings on the original bill, which was introduced by him-not the measure now pending before the Senate, but the one introduced at the beginning of the session-I insisted that I would not vote for any bill dealing with the subject of the Philippines to any extent whatever which did not contain an explicit and emphatic provision to the effect that nothing in that bill was to be taken as in any manner whatever changing or holding out any hope of changing the fundamental conditions with regard to the political independence of the Philippine people.

I did state, however, that I thought the people of the United States in making this separation after 40 years' connection with the people of the Philippines-a connection which the people of the Philippines did not seek-could afford to be very generous in their economic relationships, and to that view I adhere. I stated that I would oppose any measure dealing with the Philippines which did not contain such a provision as I have referred to, and such a provision as is contained in the pending amendment, making it perfectly clear that nothing is to change the political status. I may say that I received a telegram from the President of the Philippine Commonwealth setting forth his views to the effect that nothing contained in this measure should be taken as changing the political status of the Philippine Islands, which communication I read to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs when I was attempting to have reported a measure to bring about economic justice to the people of the Philippines.

In view of the statements of the chairman of the committee, I desire to modify my amendment again to make it mandatory and explicitly repeal, as I thought I had done, the provisions of section 13 of the act now before us, so as to read as follows:

Insert on page 15, after line 2, the following as a new section: "Sec. 4. Section 13 of the said act of March 24, 1934, is hereby amended by striking out the proviso and inserting in lieu thereof the following.'

That strikes out the provision which at the present time provides for the mandatory commission to be created 1 year before independence, and inserting in lieu thereof the fol-

Provided, That at least 2 years prior to the date fixed in this act for the independence of the Philippine Islands, there shall be held a conference of representatives of the Government of the United States and the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, the representatives of the United States to consist of United States Senators, appointed by the President of the Senate, three Members of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker of the House, and six persons appointed by the President of the United States.

That is a provision to provide for a representation of the Senate of the United States, a representation of the House of Representatives of the United States, and an equal representation to be appointed by the President of the United States, which incidentally represents the number of representatives that now are on the interdepartmental committee.

A like number of representatives of the Philippine government shall be invited to be appointed by the President of the Philippine Commonwealth, with the consent of the Commission on Appointments; the purpose of the conference shall be to formulate recommendations as to future trade relations between the Govern-ment of the United States and the independent government of the Philippine Islands, the time, place, and manner of holding such conference to be determined by the President of the United States; but nothing in this proviso-

And I mention this particularly in reference to the statement made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Typings]but nothing in this proviso shall be construed to modify or affect in any way any provision of this act relating to the procedure leading up to Philippine independence or the date upon which the Philippine Islands shall become independent.

That certainly meets every objection raised by the Senator from Maryland. The remainder of the amendment is as previously reported, having to do simply with vacancies in the Commission.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. KING. As the Senator reads his amendment, there occurs to me the question of the propriety or authority of the United States to say that the Philippine Commonwealth shall appoint representatives to take part in the formulation of the plan.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to the Senator that that provision is in the existing law.

Mr. KING. I know it is in the existing law. There is some question in my mind as to the propriety of our Government saying to the Commonwealth, "You shall appoint representatives to participate in this conference." Undoubtedly the Commonwealth will desire to have representation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. The word "may" might be substituted.

Mr. KING. I do not wish to change the existing law. I do not want it to appear that our Government assumes autocratic and tyrannical authority, and says to the Commonwealth, "You shall appoint representatives to take part in this conference."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly nothing was further from my thought than to insist that the President of the Philippine Commonwealth do anything. I shall be glad to state the matter in the permissive form.

Mr. KING. It is simply a question of comity. I should not want our Philippine brethren to feel that we were assuming the right to say what they shall do.
Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield the floor, Mr. President. Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, some question has been raised as to the insertion in the original act of the provision for a commission and a conference. That provision was discussed at length on several occasions. It seemed evident at the time the act was passed that there might be developments which would require some change in the law after the Philippine Islands became sovereign. The law as it stands treats the sovereignty of the Philippine Islands as any other sovereignty, subject to all the restrictions in tariff and other matters placed upon any other foreign country. At the time we drafted that act some of the members of the committee insisted that a rising tariff tax should be placed upon Philippine goods during the period of the Commonwealth and before the period of sovereignty, so as gradually to adjust the conditions of the islands to a complete tariff restriction after they became sovereign.

However, at the present time, from the evidence which has been submitted to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs on the original bill which was presented-and the pending bill is only half the bill which was originally presented-it is perfectly evident that we could not place such restrictions upon the sovereignty of the Philippine Islands after 1946 without practically destroying their entire economic system. The bill as originally presented to our committee by Dr. Sayre on behalf of the Interdepartmental Committee extended the period of gradual reduction of tariffs until 1961.

However, there had not been sufficient consideration of that bill. We knew nothing about the bill until it was sent to us by Dr. Sayre and handed over to the chairman of the committee to introduce. After weeks of hearings of experts in every Department, the committee became satisfied that it was not sufficiently advised to pass that kind of a bill at this time; and therefore the bill we are now considering deals only with quotas instead of taxes up until the time of sovereignty.

It is evident from the hearings before the committee that we shall be faced with numerous new problems when the time comes to decide how we shall treat the sovereignty of the Philippine Islands. We must treat them fairly after they become sovereign. We cannot afford to destroy them. There will have to be consideration of this subject under the commission to be appointed under the present act, and that consideration will probably be by one or two members of the Department. There will be a consideration by the proposed commission; or, if we repeal what is in the present law and have nothing, the President himself will send somebody to negotiate, because he has the inherent authority to do that if he wishes. The result will be just as the result was at this session of Congress: We shall have a detailed bill thrown in on the committee with no time to consider it.

I think the pending amendment is of extreme importance to the Philippine Islands as well as to the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, at the time the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Clark] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. King] were discussing the question of the use of "may" instead of "shall," I had it in mind to suggest that it seemed to me that neither of those words is quite right. I intended to suggest for the consideration of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] the use of the word "invite."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, that modification is entirely agreeable to me. Page 1, line 11, of the amendment would be modified to read:

Shall be invited to appoint a like number of representatives of the Philippine government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the modified amendment offered by the Senator from

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. One page 6 it is proposed to strike out all of lines 1 to 7, inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

(2) The quotas established by the act of June 14, 1935 (49 Stat. 340), and herein established for the commodities enumerated in such act, shall be allocated by the authorities of the Philippine government among the manufacturers of such commodities proportionately upon the following basis:

(a) The number of spindles which were installed as of February 1, 1939, for use in spinning hard-fiber yarns in each mill manufacturing such commodities

(b) The average annual production of each of said manufacturers for the calendar years 1931, 1932, and 1933.

(c) The amount or quantity each manufacturer shipped to the United States in the 12 months immediately preceding the inauguration of the commonwealth.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment is merely to strike out the provision in the bill which authorizes the allocation of the cordage shipments to this country and directs that the amount shall be reallocated under the three formulas set forth in the bill. I have undertaken to follow the original act as well as the Cordage Act and the Sugar Act. To be perfectly frank, my purpose is to have the question go to conference, so that the injustices which apparently exist under the Executive order may be eliminated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the amendment seek to impose upon the Philippine manufacturers or producers a category which may be offensive to them or unfair or discriminatory to

Mr. MILLER. No; it does not. I do not see how it could

Mr. KING. I mean discriminatory in favor of one section of the Philippines as against another section or one person as against another.

Mr. MILLER. That is what I am trying to avoid. For instance, one firm now has 63 percent of the cordage business. An American firm has 1 percent.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator from Arkansas wants to do the fair thing. I do not know whether or not his amendment accomplishes what he desires. It is directed toward a worthy purpose. The situation is that the amount of cordage produced in the Philippines which can be shipped to this country is limited.

The Senator wants to make sure that in the allocation of the cordage no one interest obtains all the business, and he has tried to take the same sort of formula that was previously used, insofar as such cordage comes to our country. I told the Senator quite frankly that the committee had not considered that phase of the question, and that, while I personally would not oppose his amendment, it was quite likely that it might have to be dropped or altered in conference. I know it is the desire of the Congress to deal fairly with the respective interests in the Philippines, and not to allow any one or two or three firms to take all the business and exclude others, particularly when a part of the business is operated by continental American capital.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not his amendment, which I have just heard read for the first time, would result in an increase in the amount of cordage coming to this country.

Mr. MILLER. Ch, no! It would not change the situation at all.

Mr. LODGE. It would not change the quantity?

Mr. MILLER. Not at all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the amendment going to conference; but I should be unwilling to have the Senate of the United States assume to direct the manufacturers or the people of the Philippines as to how they should allocate whatever commodities they produce for shipment to the United States.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the point of the Senator from Utah is well taken. I think perhaps in conference we can find some way of accomplishing the desired object without doing that against which the Senator from Utah protests.

Mr. MILLER. I think so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendments to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF SECOND LIBERTY BOND ACT

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 5748. It is a bill to amend the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended. It does not increase limitation on the national debt, but it eliminates the partition within the $45,000,000,000 limit.

I may say, in making the motion, that I expect to follow it by asking that the bill be made the unfinished business, and shall not press it tonight. I merely move that it be considered.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask to have the motion

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated by the clerk.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 5748) to amend the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I shall not proceed with the bill tonight. The Senator from Utah [Mr. King] desires to discuss it tomorrow. It is so late tonight that I merely desire to have the bill made the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5748) to amend the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the bill which has just been made the unfinished business. I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Johnson of Colorado in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably the nominations of sundry persons for promotion in the Foreign Service.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of several postmasters.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, reported favorably the nomination of Mrs. Jessie M. Gardner, of Colorado, to be register of the land office at Denver, Colo. (Reappointment.)

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, reported favorably the nomination of David J. Lewis, of Maryland, to be a member of the National Mediation Board for the remainder of the term expiring February 1, 1940, vice William M. Leiserson.

Mr. ASHURST (for Mr. O'MAHONEY), from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Robert N. Wilkin, of Ohio, to be United States district judge for the northern district of Ohio, vice Samuel H. West, deceased.

Mr. AUSTIN (for Mr. Hughes), from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Calvert Magruder, of Massachusetts, to be judge of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, vice George H. Bingham, retired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

THE JUDICIARY-LESLIE R. DARR

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Leslie R. Darr to be United States district judge for the middle and eastern districts of Tennessee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] whether the confirmation of the judge with this title will in any way affect the bill which is pending before the Judiciary Committee which, as I understand, looks toward the ultimate creation of a new district in Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; the confirmation of this nominee will not do that. This is a roving judge, and his confirmation would have nothing to do with that bill unless the bill should become a law, in which event he would become judge of that district.

I may say that this nomination was previously reported to the Senate by the committee; but the initials were wrong, and the nomination had to be sent back to the White House. This is a second submission of the nomination. I hope the Senator from Utah will allow it to be confirmed.

Mr. KING. The only point I was attempting to make is that there is pending before the Judiciary Committee a bill of the kind I have stated; and at the last meeting of the committee some objection was made to its being favorably reported because there was some question as to what its effect would be, whether it contemplated the creation of a new district or what effect it might have upon the nomination which is now before the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. The confirmation of this judge's nomination would have no effect on that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination? Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will state the next nomination on the calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the nominations of post-masters be confirmed en bloc.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MAY 31, 1939

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Christ, our Saviour and Redeemer, through endless years the same, we lift our prayer to Thee. We bless Thee that across the troubled waves of the sea of life comes the assurance: "I will never leave nor forsake thee." Underneath our stumbling doubts and our bewildering griefs are the everlasting arms of power and unchangeable goodness. Do Thou grant to those who desire the vision of wisdom, a stronger faith, the spirit of patience, and Thy directive presence. We pray that the Congress may heed the call of duty, and may the pride of our lives be to serve all men with free minds and warm hearts. Heavenly Father, inspire us all with those plain, heroic virtues out of which good men and great souls are fashioned, and men who lift the world and roll it in another course. In the holy name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran]?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the Record and to include therein a letter to the Wages and Hours Committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran]?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, last week I was invited to appear before Industry Committee No. 6 for Shoe Manufacturing and Allied Industries considering the question of compensation under the Wage and Hour Act. I did not appear before that committee for several reasons which I set out in a communication addressed to the committee, which reads as follows:

MAY 26, 1939.

INDUSTRY COMMITTEE NO. 6 FOR SHOE

MANUFACTURING AND ALLIED INDUSTRIES,

Wage and Hour Division, Department of Labor,

Washington, D. C. GENTLEMEN: It has come to my notice that a number of Members of Congress from both sides of the Capitol appeared before your committee Thursday and Friday of this week in connection with your public hearing.

I was requested to appear before your committee, but I declined, as I felt it would be highly unethical. I cannot see where it is the duty of a Member of Congress to enter into a discussion before a committee of this character on any administrative procedure. My view is that Congress should confine itself to legislation and let those who are responsible administer the law. So long as the law is being properly administered Congress should let the administration alone, but if information comes to the Congress that the law is not being properly administered, then, and not until then, is it the duty of Congress to take any action.

I do not know whether it is true or not, as I was not present, but I was told that at least one Member intimated if the law was not properly administered, Congress would repeal the act. In reply to that I will say that the wage and hour law will be on the statute books long after the ones who are now in Congress have passed away. It is needless for me to tell you that your committee has at its disposal Government agencies that will supply you with statistics and facts, including cost of living at various locations, etc., which might not be advanced by the employers or the employees.

If the committee is in doubt as to the interpretation of any part of the act, the legal division of the Wage and Hour Administration is certainly in a position to furnish that information.

I would no more attempt to influence your committee than I would a Federal judge, and it is my hope all questions arising under the Wage and Hour Act will be decided on the facts and the committee and the Administrator will ignore the pressure.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. Speaker, I have outlined my views on this subject so that my constituents will understand my attitude now and in the future.

Probably some of my colleagues will take issue with what I have to say, but I am certainly entitled to express my cpinion, even if we are in disagreement.

If Members of the House and Senate are going to attend every hearing that is held, we will soon find a debate between Members of Congress on every issue presented to the Wage and Hour Administration. Congress provided by law how these disputes should be settled, and, while of course we did not prohibit Congressmen or Senators from appearing before a committee, still it seems to me we should refrain from trying to influence the decision of a committee set up in pursuance to law.

We are receiving complaints every day in regard to the administration of some laws enacted to benefit both employer and employee, but so far as I know the administration of the Wage and Hour Act has up to the moment been commended rather than condemned. I have confidence in the Administrator and the committees to work out these problems, and, as I said in my letter, I sincerely hope both will render their decisions on the facts and ignore the pressure.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SMITH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I shall make today on H. R. 6466, the Townsend bill, by inserting certain letters and memorandum from argricultural and labor organizations, and other material having a direct bearing on the bill, and which would be of interest to the Members of the House. The estimate I have received from the Public Printer is that it would require approximately 4 pages of the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. Jones of Texas, Mr. Doxey, and Mr. Hope.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record by inserting therein an address delivered by our colleague the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Plumley] during the past week at a school in my State.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 205 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 205

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 6466, a bill to provide for and promote the general welfare of the United States by supplying to the people a more liberal distribution and increase of purchasing power, retiring certain citizens from gainful employment, improving and stabilizing gainful employment for other citizens, stimulating agricultural and industrial production and general business, and alleviating the hazards and insecurity of old age and unemployment, etc., and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 4 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, of the time allowed for debate I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Mapes], to be in turn yielded by him as he sees fit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, this resolution simply proposes to provide for the consideration of the so-called Townsend bill. From reading the resolution Members will observe that this is what is called a closed rule. I should like to say to the House that the Committee on Rules was somewhat reluctant to report a closed rule for the consideration of this measure, but the author of the bill and, we understand, the founder of the movement, as well as the Committee on Ways and Means, asked for this rule in the form in which it is now pending.

Except for the fact that the measure is one that for a number of years has claimed public attention throughout the country, your Committee on Rules would probably have not, even upon request of the Committee on Ways and Means, have reported a resolution for the consideration of a measure that was reported out without any recommendation whatever. The procedure is somewhat unusual.

I am sure the Members of the House would welcome an explanation of the circumstances and the reasons under which and by which this bill was reported from the Committee on Ways and Means. For the purpose of their being accommodated in that respect, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield for that purpose?

Mr. DOUGHTON. If it will not come out of my time.

The SPEAKER. It would have to come out of the time of the gentleman.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I cannot yield if it comes out of my time. I do not have control of the time; the Rules Committee controls the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina can yield during his time, but if the gentleman from North Carolina yields, of course the time will be taken out of his time.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended 2 minutes in order that I may propound my parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from New York of the opinion that his parliamentary inquiry can be propounded and an answer given within 2 minutes? The Chair does not know what reply he will have to make to the inquiry. The gentleman from New York could ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to propound a parliamentary inquiry and that an answer be given by the Chair without its being taken out of the time under the rule.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to propound a parliamentary inquiry, with the reservation that the time be not taken out of the time of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. RAYBURN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I have no idea how much time it will take for the gentleman from New York to propound his parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman has in his hand a document which might take some time to read. If the gentleman desires to propound a parliamentary inquiry without making a speech, an inquiry that can be submitted in a few words and answered "yes" or "no" by the Speaker, I have no objection; but if the gentleman has a parliamentary inquiry whose submission will take some time, I feel constrained to object.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. I am pleased to tell the gentleman it will take me only a half minute to propound my parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. RAYBURN. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker. The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. RAYBURN. I have no objection to the gentleman's proceeding for a half minute.

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I have ascertained that about 134 Members of this House are over 60 years of age, and, therefore, they might be considered to have a direct personal interest in the pending bill, H. R. 6466, known as the Townsend plan. I regard all the Members as men of honor, but I feel that in such an important issue as the pending one-

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The gentleman is not rising to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. I will state it in just a second if the gentleman will permit me to proceed.

I feel that in such an important issue as the pending one the House and the country are entitled to know whether or not these Members over the age of 60 are disqualified to vote under rule VIII of the House. If this bill passes they will automatically become immediate beneficiaries under the provisions of the bill. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, my parliamentary inquiry is, Are such Members disqualified from voting on this bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has propounded a parliamentary inquiry which, of course, the Chair assumes is propounded in good faith, and the Chair imagines that the gentleman has in mind rule VIII of the House of Representatives, which is in the following language:

Every Member shall be present within the Hall of the House during its sittings unless excused or necessarily prevented, and shall vote on each question put unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question.

The Chair does not feel, in view of the pressing circumstances with respect to time, it is necessary to undertake to elaborate upon this question, as it is certainly not a novel one, and in the brief time since the gentleman gave notice he would propound his parliamentary inquiry the Chair has found that this question has been specifically presented to the House on a number of occasions and finds that very thoughtful and elaborate opinions have been rendered upon this point, particularly by Mr. Speaker Blaine (Hinds' Precedents, vol. V, sec. 5952), by Mr. Speaker Longworth (Cannon's Precedents, vol. VIII, sec. 3072), and by Mr. Speaker Clark (Cannon's Precedent's, vol. VIII, sec. 3071), all of whom join in the conclusion stated in the syllabus of the Blaine opinion in the following language:

Where the subject matter before the House affects a class rather than individuals, the personal interest of Members who belong to that class is not such as to disqualify them from voting.

The power of the House to deprive one of its Members of the right to vote on any question is doubtful.

If the Chair were disposed to elaborate upon the opinion announced in the Blaine decision, it might be proper for him to read extracts from that decision. However, it seems to be well determined-and the Chair thinks it is based on sound reasoning and philosophy—that where a bill comes up affecting a general class of people and no direct or personal pecuniary interest of a Member as such is involved, Members are not proscribed in absolute good faith and in all morality from voting upon a bill of that character.

If the rule were otherwise, all of us would probably be subject to some prohibition in the way of voting upon Federal taxation. It might be taken to excuse ourselves from voting upon such questions because our pecuniary interests are involved. A number of other suggestions might be made along the same line.

So the Chair answers the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from New York to the effect that under the rulings of former Speakers in well-considered opinions and as a matter of constitutional right the Members can, and should, in all good faith vote upon the bill now involved.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable discussion and some criticism of the action of the Committee on Ways and Means in reporting the bill H. R. 6466, known as the Hendricks or Townsend bill, to the House without recommendation. It is a fact that this is an unusual procedure, and so far as I recall this is the first bill that has ever been reported in this manner by the Ways and Means Committee since I have been a member of that committee, some 14 or 15 years, and, certainly, the first bill that has been reported in this way since I have been its chairman. But we were confronted with an unusual situation, Mr. Speaker.

Never in all my knowledge of the work of our committee has there been such universal or general demand that the House be given an opportunity to consider any measure that has been before our committee. I received more than 25,000 letters urging, and some demanding, that this measure be reported out by our committee so that the Members could have an opportunity to express themselves upon it.

In addition to this, Mr. Speaker, scores, and I may say hundreds, of Members of this House, some for and some against the measure, some favorable and some unfavorable, have said to me that they felt that this bill is of sufficient importance to the membership of the House and to the entire country that the Members should be given an opportunity to vote on it.

So far as I know, Mr. Speaker, there is not one of the 25 members of our committee who were present during all the hearings and heard the testimony taken by our committee who is favorable to this bill. I have not heard them all express themselves, but I feel sure that I am on safe ground when I make this statement, because, while the opportunity was given, no member of our committee made a motion to report the bill favorably, although, as I say, such opportunity was afforded. Therefore, we felt that in consideration of the widespread demand and the earnest insistence coming to us from all directions, especially, I repeat, from Members of the House, those favorable and those unfavorable, that we would be derelict in our duty and our responsibility if we smothered the bill in committee, as we were charged with doing, and did not in some way give the membership of the House an opportunity to express itself.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Is it true that not one member of the gentleman's committee after 5 months of hearings in the committee favored the bill?

Mr. DOUGHTON. None of them moved to report it favorably, and I take it from that that no one was strenuously in favor of it.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. After a hearing of 5 months?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Nearly 3 months, and the longer it was heard the more unfavorable the committee was toward it.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Does not the gentleman think that the House had a right to expect a verdict on those hearings?

Mr. DOUGHTON. It is not a question of what I think. It is the judgment of our committee that this is the most practical proceeding that we could take.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Was there a formal request made for an open rule by the proponents of the measure?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No, there was not, that I ever heard of. Mr. DIRKSEN. I was informed that a request for an open rule is still before the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DOUGHTON. By whom? I never heard of it until This is the first intimation I ever had of it.

Mr. McCORMACK. As a matter of fact the request of the proponents of the measure was for a closed rule.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The proponents of the measure insisted on a closed rule. Some might call it a gag rule. We deferred to the request, almost the demand, of the proponents of the measure.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 minutes

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. SWEENEY. Does the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means state for the purpose of the RECORD that no member of the Ways and Means Committee will vote for this bill?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; I did not say that. I said I felt that none of them was favorable to it for the reason that no one moved to report it favorably.

Mr. BUCK. Not merely did no one move to report it favorably, but the chairman asked whether there was any member present in a full committee meeting who desired to make such a motion.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is correct.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. TERRY. Why was it that H. R. 6466 was reported out instead of H. R. 2, on which the hearings were held?

Mr. DOUGHTON. That was done at the instance and insistence of the proponents of the measure, the author of the measure. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS] said they wanted a vote on the last version of the Townsend plan, H. R. 6466, which superseded and replaced H. R. 2.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Is it not a fact that when the action of the committee was taken reporting out the bill without recommendation only two members of the committee voted against that action?

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes. First, Mr. Speaker, if I may, I congratulate the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] and the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton], upon the enthusiasm and heartiness with which they have supported this resolution in their opening statements. [Laughter.] Let me also emphasize the statement that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means made, that this is the first and only time in his experience in the House of Representatives that the Committee on Ways and Means has ever reported a piece of legislation to the House without recommendation. In that connection I call attention to the fact that the distinguished chairman of that committee has been a Member of the House of Representatives for 30 years.

In order to keep the record straight let me say at the outset, as one member of the committee, I voted against this rule in the Committee on Rules. It is a gag rule and ought to be defeated. It provides for 4 hours of talk, 4 hours of balderdash only, and then compels a vote on the bill as it is without any opportunity to amend or perfect it. I am opposed to being gagged and bound in that way. [Applause.]

I say that with no desire to avoid a vote on the bill. In fact, I welcome an opportunity to vote on it, but I refuse to take any responsibility for this procedure. This procedure, as distinguished from the legislation, makes it as easy as it is possible to do for anyone to vote against the bill. I favor legislation making adequate provision for people in their old age, but I am not in favor of this bill as presented to us here. What the Committee on Ways and Means might have worked out if it had really tried, no one knows. If it had not run out on its job it might have recommended a real constructive piece of legislation that the most of us would have been glad to support. [Applause.]

Under this rule, if adopted, the House can do nothing more than go through the motions of considering a piece of legislation which has been characterized as "one of the most farreaching revenue measures that has ever been presented to the American people," without its ever having been seriously considered by the Committee on Ways and Means to which it was referred and without the benefit of any recommendation on it by that or any other committee of Congress. Indeed, it is more accurate to say that the rule not only compels consideration of it under those circumstances, but requires that the bill be voted up or down without any opportunity to consider it seriously even on the floor of the House. It must be voted upon as it is after 4 hours of nothing but talk without any opportunity to amend or perfect What a travesty on legislative procedure. Others may be a party to such procedure if they choose, but I am not going to be. [Applause.]

The bill before us is not H. R. 2, which the Townsend people have been writing us about. It is a new bill. It is H. R. 6466. H. R. 2 provided for a transaction tax. bill provides for a gross-income or consumers tax. President Roosevelt, in his recent speech to the retailers here in Washington, had this to say as to such a tax:

It would be bad for business-

He said-

to shift any further burden to consumer taxes. The proportion of consumer taxes to the total is plenty high enough as it is. Remember, as businessmen and as retailers, that any further taxes on consumer, like a sales tax, means that the consumer can buy fewer goods at your store.

Let me ask the followers of President Roosevelt on the Democratic side of the aisle how they can support this bill in view of that position of the President.

No one knows how much anyone would get if this bill should be enacted into law. Townsendites are looking for $200 per month. Everyone concedes that they would get no more than a small fraction of that amount under this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes, I yield to one of the leading proponents of the Townsend bill.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. I would like to ask the distinguished gentleman from Michigan if it is not a fact that for the past 4 years, ever since April 1935, there has been no bill pending before the Congress providing for a flat payment of $200 per month? So why keep talking about something which does not exist?

Mr. MAPES. Let me reply by asking the gentleman if he does not believe that the Townsend people, if this bill passes, which I am told would provide only about $30 or $31 a month to those over 60 years of age, will make a drive on the next and the following Congresses asking for a higher tax so as to increase the amount which they will receive under this legislation?

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Does the gentleman desire me to answer that question?

Mr. MAPES. I cannot yield further now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I cannot yield now.

Everyone concedes that they will get no more than a small fraction of $200 under this bill.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. MAPES. I yield to my colleague from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the statement made by Dr. Townsend on page 647 of the hearings, where he says this:

I am after that $200 a month, and I am going to have it, and I am going to stay after it until I overtake it.

Mr. MAPES. Certainly. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER. The fact is that repeatedly throughout the hearings, Dr. Townsend stated that it was $200 a month he was advocating; that is what he wanted, and in a short time it should be made $300 a month. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. And, that is what the old people of this country have been led to believe they will receive if this legislation is passed.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. MAPES. I cannot yield to the gentleman further at this time

This bill was never even considered by the Committee on Ways and Means. The draft which we are asked to vote upon was not introduced until the day before the committee washed its hands of it by reporting it without recommendation. It was available in printed form only an hour or so before the committee took the action it did. No one familiar with legislative procedure and with Congress has any expectation or hope that it will be enacted into law. It is not here for that purpose. It is here for political purposes only. Everyone knows that. The purpose is so clear that it is transparent. There ought to be some better reason for the passage or consideration of legislation so vital to the welfare of the Nation and to those whose hearts are set upon getting legislation which will provide them with reasonable security in their declining years.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 7 additional minutes.

I have never been very good at playing the game of makebelieve or fooling people, and I am not going to attempt it on this legislation.

Our Democratic colleague from New York is quoted in an interview as characterizing the action of the Committee on Ways and Means on this bill as "shysterism and trickery." That is stronger language than I am in the habit of using. In this connection, it must be remembered that the Democratic Party is in control of the Committee on Ways and Means, as it is of all other committees of the House. It determines what legislation will be considered and what will not be.

The friends and advocates of legislation to provide adequate security for old people in their declining years cannot help but be greatly disappointed over the situation with which the House is confronted. Regardless of the merits of the legislation, the procedure adopted to bring it up is a hoax pure and simple. No one can be proud of it. No one can defend it. We are asked to pass a gag rule, which will permit of no amendment, to consider legislation of vital importance which is full of loopholes, imperfections, and ambiguities and which is not recommended by the committee to which it was referred, nor any member of it, as far as the record shows.

The debate here already discloses that members of the Ways and Means Committee were invited by the chairman in executive session to make a motion to report it favorably and no one on that committee responded. No one has any idea even what its effect on the country will be, if passed. My observation has been that legislation gets nowhere in Congress unless it is first sold to a reasonable number of the members of the committee which has jurisdiction of it, and this has not been.

The advocates of the Townsend plan for years asked for a hearing. The Committee on Ways and Means early in the year was good enough to give them extensive hearings. I was glad to have the committee give them a hearing. I thought they were entitled to it. But, with the close of the hearings, the committee ceased to function, as far as this legislation is concerned. It ran out on its job. It made no attempt to perfect the legislation—no attempt to make it workable and constructive. It never considered it in executive session. Neither the House nor the country nor the Townsendites had the benefit of the study, the judgment, or the recommendation of the committee.

The Committee on Ways and Means is a great committee—the greatest in the House. The members of it are capable. Most of them have been Members of the House a long time. They are experts on tax and other questions with which the committee has to deal. The House is entitled to the collective judgment of the members of that committee before being asked to pass upon legislation coming from it of this importance.

I appreciate the longing and the hope of the elderly people of this country for constructive legislation in their behalf. I make no criticism of them. In fact, I have every sympathy for them and their ambition in that respect. I have always favored adequate pensions for those along in years who need assistance to provide them with the comforts of life, but I refuse to be a party to this hoax. I have not been and I do not intend to start to be today. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has consumed 15 minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS] the author of the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this so-called "gag" rule for a purpose. Ordinarily I would not be in favor of "gag" rules, but the time comes when I think that they are justified. We, the proponents of this bill and the opponents of this bill, favor the "gag" rule because we are determined to vote upon an issue and not simply a scrap of paper. We know that those who may like to straddle the fence for a while longer, or those who dread to face this may offer amendments to the bill which would so butcher the bill that when we reached a final vote on it, we would not be voting on the Townsend plan; and for that reason I, with a block of supporters, have asked for a closed rule in order that when we reach a vote on this bill the Members may be able to say "yes" or "no" on the Townsend plan and not something else. I know amendments may be offered to permit certain people to go back and straddle the fence for a while longer, and be able to explain their votes.

This question of opposing "gag" rule does not surprise me in the slightest. I have been here 3 years and I have learned a good deal. I have come to the conclusion and have been convinced that there are many Members of this House who would seek any issue to save themselves from having to vote on this bill. A good many have been willing to say, patting this bill on the back: "You are a mighty fine bill, but I hope to God you will never get to the floor of the House." For that reason, although I would have preferred that the Ways and Means Committee had given us a favorable report on this bill—I asked if they could not give us a favorable report then to report it to the House without recommendation in order that we might be able to declare ourselves.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Not for the moment.

There may be some question as to where the friends of this bill stand on this closed rule and on this bill. You have heard the argument, and will again, that this is not the bill H. R. 2, that instead of being H. R. 2 it is H. R. 6466. Minor changes only have been made. Furthermore, the hearings on H. R. 2 are available to every Member of the House. I dare to say that if the opponents of this rule were asked if they had read the testimony on H. R. 2 that practically every one of them would have to say, "No; I have not." Had this bill been before the House for 6 months and hearings been held on it, those same Members would not have read the hearings on this bill.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I yield gladly.

Mr. COX. Is the House to understand from what the gentleman has stated that he and his associates, the advocates of the adoption of this proposal, join with him in asking for the adoption of the rule, and that the gentleman and his associates, the advocates of the measure, will vote for the previous question?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am sure that is true, I may say to the gentleman from Georgia. I have not questioned every one of them. We would have preferred more time, but we have agreed to this.

Mr. COX. I have understood that that was also the request of the founder of the movement.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall be glad to clear that up by reading a couple of letters written by Dr. Townsend, one addressed to myself and one addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Rules.

Under date of May 15, 1939, Dr. Townsend wrote me as

My Dear Representative: It is my understanding that while there has not yet been any official action taken by the Committee on Ways and Means on H. R. 2 that if we will present a new bill including the amendments which are submitted to the committee, the committee will report the bill without recommendation and the leaders will give us 4 hours in which to discuss the bill offer which we will have a relieful work. after which we will have a roll-call vote.

I do not think the time allotted to this bill is sufficient.

lieve its importance justifies at least 10 hours' debate; however, in order to get a roll-call vote on our bill, which is what we desire, I feel that our supporters are justified in agreeing to the 4 hours'

I trust that every Member of Congress will give this measure his most careful and sympathetic consideration as a constructive contribution to the national recovery we all desire.

Under date of May 24 last Dr. Townsend addressed a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Rules, from which I read the following:

Congressman Hendricks has called my attention to the fact that the Committee on Ways and Means reported H. R. 6466 to the House of Representatives without a recommendation. It is my House of Representatives without a recommendation. It is my understanding that the chairman of the committee was also instructed to ask for a rule on this bill. Congressman Hendricks called my attention to the fact that all concerned were desirous of knowing whether this bill, H. R. 6466, had my approval.

While we all realize that this bill is not a perfect bill, we believe it to be the best that we can get at this time, and we are therefore asking the Rules Committee give us a rule in order that this bill may be discussed in the House of Representatives and a record vote taken on this bill as the Townsend issue at this time.

Mr. Speaker, Dr. Townsend asked me further to convey this message to friends of this bill in the House of Repre-

Friends have advised me that in all probability there will be certain dilatory tactics used to damage our bill. I understand that there will be an attempt to vote down the previous question on the rule and also a motion to recommit the bill.

Will you kindly assure our friends that either move will be considered an attempt to scuttle our bill, and ask them to cooperate with you in voting against these tactics.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I am justified in saying that any vote to vote down the previous question on this rule or any vote to recommit this bill will be considered a vote against the Townsend bill. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I realize that in appearing before you for such a short time that very little can be accomplished, but I do appeal in this brief time on behalf of the elderly people of this country, whom I think are going to be misled by reason of the action of the House this after-

I agree with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Mapes], who left the floor a moment ago, that the manner in which the Ways and Means Committee has reported this bill to the House—a measure involving one of the most important questions that has come on the floor for consideration—is unprecedented. Here we are, faced with this most important measure, involving the livelihood of thousands of people, only to find that the Ways and Means Committee, under the leadership of the great majority party, saying to us: "We will just run out on you. We will not even take charge of the bill during its consideration this afternoon."

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. No; I have not the time or I would be glad to

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of a fair and adequate system of providing for the maintenance of these elderly people. The manner in which we have handled the question of social security is a shame and a disgrace. I am in favor of giving this question the fair consideration to which it is entitled at the hands of the Ways and Means Committee, and which it should receive at the hands of the membership of this House. And now the powerful Rules Committee, evidently at the request of the Ways and Means Committee, has said to the Congress: "We will give you 4 hours during which to consider. without amendments, this measure, and then you must vote for or against it." It seems to me that we are at least entitled to a chance to vote on this important question fair and square on its merits. If the bill should not be amended, let it stand. But if there are places in it that should be properly improved and changed, we should have a right to do it.

For instance, under the terms of this bill, chambers of commerce and national banks are exempt from its terms. But State banks, doing business across the street, will have to be taxed. There are other points in the bill that could easily be remedied so that we would have a reasonably fair working measure.

We have always claimed that the House of Representatives was a deliberative body and one where the membership had a right to express its views, but the Rules Committee has invoked an ironclad "gag" rule that says, by inference at least, that we will not even be given a chance to debate the bill pro and con and shall not offer even the slightest amendment. We were told just a moment ago by those who have some information on this bill that it may provide between $15 to $30 per month to those who will be affected thereby. We do not know how much it will produce. In fact no one on the floor seems to have that information. This is not H. R. 2. It is a different bill. Hearings were held on H. R. 2, but no hearings were held on this bill. It was introduced one day and the next day the Ways and Means Committee handed it over to the membership of the House. It seems they wanted to get rid of it. Whether this is a Townsend bill or not should not make any difference. The question is whether or not it is good legislation. Will it provide the revenues for the people of this country who really need it? Our present social-security law has been a great disappointment to the needy people of our country. Let us enact legislation that will provide adequate means of support for older people as well as for those who, by reason of misfortune over which they have no control, are unable to provide a fair and reasonable living for themselves.

Let us give this legislation the fair and decent consideration to which it is entitled. Let us not forget that this is the only old-age pension bill which has been submitted on the floor of Congress during the 5 months we have been in Congress. I am told by those who have been in Congress for many years that a bill that comes to the floor of the House without recommendation rarely if ever passes Congress. It seems to me that this is a left-hand way of defeating a measure which, if it could be properly debated and reasonably amended, could become a workable piece of legislation. In any event, whether the measure is good or bad, it just is not the way to handle it. The question involved, that of old-age assistance, is too big and too important to be handled in such a trivial manner.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PEARSON].

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, in addressing myself to this resolution, I want to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Rules to what in my mind is a very essential amendment to the pending rule. The first line of | the rule states:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of H. R. 6466, a bill to provide for and promote the general welfare—

And so forth. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the rule is a declaration of what this bill does, with which some might not agree. I believe the word "entitled" should be inserted in the rule after the figures "6466" to quote the title of the bill rather than declare in the rule that it is a bill which will provide for and promote the general welfare of the United States. I hope the chairman will accept such an amendment so to perfect the language used in the resolution.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY].

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, today we are debating a rule which makes in order the immediate consideration of H. R. 6466, popularly known as the Townsend plan. This bill has been reported by the Committee on Ways and Means without recommendation—a most unusual procedure on the part of this powerful committee. Upon the adoption of this rule the House will begin 4 hours of debate on the bill, after which the bill as reported must be voted up or down without privilege of offering a single amendment.

I regret that the Ways and Means Committee, which is supposed to consist of stout-hearted men and who should be prepared to fight to protect the financial security of our country as well as to serve as the right arm of the President in maintaining the national credit, has seen fit to report this fantastic bill to the House. In my opinion, the adoption of the Townsend plan would wreck and destroy the Social Security Act, which has taken years to develop.

As a Member who has always voted for progressive, liberal, and humane legislation, I am going to vote against this bill because I am in favor of meeting present-day requirements by extending the benefits provided by the Social Security Act.

No one could have a more sincere interest in the welfare and security of our aged and helpless citizens and dependent children than our President. At the present moment there is pending a series of amendments to further liberalize the Social Security Act which have been suggested by Mr. Roosevelt. As you know, these amendments have my wholehearted support, and I propose to work for their adoption.

May I suggest as a most complete answer to the proponents of the Townsend plan that they read the message of the President to the Congress under date of January 16, 1939, containing his views on the liberalization of the existing Social Security Act.

Mr. Speaker, the following is the message of the President, and I, for one, intend to accept his recommendations. I shall not desert the President to enlist with Dr. Townsend.

To the Congress of the United States:

Four years ago I sent to the newly convened Congress a message transmitting a report of the Committee on Economic Security. In that message I urged that Congress consider the enactment into law of the program of protection for our people outlined in that report. The Congress acted upon that recommendation and today we have the Social Security Act in effect throughout the length and breadth of our country.

This act has amply proved its essential soundness.

More than two and one-half million needy old people, needy blind persons, and dependent children are now receiving systematic and humane assistance to the extent of a half billion dollars a year.

Three and a half million unemployed persons have received out-of-work benefits amounting to $400,000,000 during the

A Federal old-age insurance system, the largest undertaking of its kind ever attempted, has been organized and under it there have been set up individual accounts covering 42,- 500,000 persons who may be likened to the policyholders of a private insurance company.

In addition there are the splendid accomplishments in the field of public health, vocational rehabilitation, maternal and child welfare, and related services, made possible by the Social Security Act.

We have a right to be proud of the progress we have made in the short time the Social Security Act has been in operation. However, we would be derelict in our responsibility if we did not take advantage of the experience we have accumulated to strengthen and extend its provisions. I submit for your consideration a report of the Social Security Board, which, at my direction and in accordance with the congressional mandate contained in the Social Security Act itself, has been assembling data, and developing ways and means of improving the operation of the Social Security Act.

I particularly call attention to the desirability of affording greater old-age security. The report suggests a twofold approach which I believe to be sound. One way is to begin the payment of monthly old-age insurance benefits sooner, and to liberalize the benefits to be paid in the early years. The other way is to make proportionately larger Federal grants-in-aid to those States with limited fiscal capacities, so that they may provide more adequate assistance to those in need. This result can and should be accomplished in such a way as to involve little, if any, additional cost to the Federal Government. Such a method embodies a principle that may well be applied to other Federal grants-in-aid.

I also call attention to the desirability of affording greater protection to dependent children. Here again the report suggests a twofold approach which I believe to be sound. One way is to extend our Federal old-age insurance system so as to provide regular monthly benefits not only to the aged but also to the dependent children of workers dying before reaching retirement age. The other way is to liberalize the Federal grants-in-aid to the States to help finance assistance to dependent children.

As regards both the Federal old-age insurance system and the Federal-State unemployment compensation system, equity and sound social policy require that the benefits be extended to all of our people as rapidly as administrative experience and public understanding permit. Such an extension is particularly important in the case of the Federal old-age insurance system. Even without amendment, the old-age insurance benefits payable in the early years are very liberal in comparison with the taxes paid. This is necessarily so in order that these benefits may accomplish their purpose of forestalling dependency. But this very fact creates the necessity of extending this protection to as large a proportion as possible of our employed population in order to avoid unfair discrimination.

Much of the success of the Social Security Act is due to the fact that all of the programs contained in this act-with one necessary exception-are administered by the States themselves, but coordinated and partially financed by the Federal Government. This method has given us flexible administration and has enabled us to put these programs into operation quickly. However, in some States incompetent and politically dominated personnel has been distinctly harmful. Therefore, I recommend that the States be required, as a condition for the receipt of Federal funds, to establish and maintain a merit system for the selection of personnel. Such a requirement would represent a protection to the States and citizens thereof rather than an encroachment by the Federal Government, since it would automatically promote efficiency and eliminate the necessity for minute Federal scrutiny of State operations.

I cannot too strongly urge the wisdom of building upon the principles contained in the present Social Security Act in affording greater protection to our people, rather than turning to untried and demonstrably unsound panaceas. As I stated in my message 4 years ago:

It is overwhelmingly important to avoid any danger of permanently discrediting the sound and necessary policy of Federal legislation for economic security by attempting to apply it on too ambitious a scale before actual experience has provided guidance for the permanently safe direction of such efforts. The place of such a fundamental in our future civilization is too precious to be jeopardized now by extravagant action.

We shall make the most orderly progress if we look upon social security as a development toward a goal rather than a finished product. We shall make the most lasting progress if we recognize that social security can furnish only a base upon which each one of our citizens may build his individual security through his own individual efforts.

Franklin D. Rooseyelt.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I want to refer briefly to the colloquy which I had a moment ago with the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Mapes] in regard to the alleged $200 per month provided in the pending legislation. I call attention to the fact that commencing on April 1, 1935, every Townsend bill that has been introduced in the House has provided for a ceiling or maximum amount "not to exceed $200 per month." I defy the gentleman from Michigan or anybody else to point to any bill since April 1, 1935, which has provided for the express, flat payment of $200 per month, which has always been and still remains the ultimate objective. Each and every one of the bills, including the pending bill, H. R. 6466, introduced by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS], at the request of Dr. Townsend, provides for a tax on manufacturing, production, wholesaling, also retailing, as a tax formula, and further provides that the revenue yielded shall be prorated and the amount yielded shall be paid to the recipients of the pension. It is about time therefore that we cease talking all this bugaboo of an immediate payment of $200 per month, which is not involved in this legislation at all. The estimated payment based on the present business turn-over of the country is at the rate of from $50 to $75 per month, which Dr. Townsend and those of us who are supporting this legislation feel confident will rapidly increase commensurate with the increase in the national income which everybody admits is far short of what it could and should be. As the national income increases the business turn-over and volume of business sales and transactions will also increase and consequently cause an increase in the revenue yielded for tax and pension purposes and increase the sum available to the pensioners. Could anything be clearer? I therefore submit that it is manifestly unfair to argue that $200 per month is to be paid from the very start, which is not possible upon the present business turn-over and national income, and which the legislation does not call for.

Mr. Speaker, I am supporting this closed rule, something I have never done before, as I favor rules which leave the legislation open to amendment as a matter of the highest principle, because this is the only way we can have a vote on the Townsend plan at the present time.

I have received scores of air-mail letters urging my support of the legislation, and as a part of my remarks I insert a number of telegrams received from Townsend clubs in my district:

ABERDEEN, WASH., May 31, 1939.

Resolution passed at regular meeting Townsend Club 33 members, Fargher Lake, Clark County, requesting your support H. R. 2. L. I. Nichols, President, Mrs. ALICE PICHROB, Secretary, Yacolt, Wash.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, this is the biggest tax bill ever brought into the Congress or any other legislative body in the world, either in war or peace; yet we are asked to consider it under a "gag" rule. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS], who is sponsoring this measure, introduced on May 10 and sent to the Rules Committee House Resolution 189, asking for an open rule. What has caused him to change? I assume that he received some definite promises that he could get a bill out under a "gag" rule, but in no other way.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will answer the question promptly. We had amendments we wanted in the bill. We could not get them in H. R. 2; therefore we had to have an open rule to amend the bill in exactly the form we wanted. That is the reason I introduced that resolution.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Townsend in his letter just read, to Chairman Sabath of the Rules Committee, says:

While we all realize this is not a perfect bill

Even in spite of this admission by Dr. Townsend, we are supposed to consider it under a "gag" rule which permits no amendments to perfect it and to enable us to pass a constructive and feasible pension bill.

This "gag" rule forced out of the committee is an abomination of desolation and an evil and outrageous procedure. The Democratic leaders of the House are responsible for bringing up the Townsend pension plan for the aged under this drastic "gag" rule, which, if adopted by the House, permits no consideration of the proposal on its merits.

Apparently the purpose of the rule is to insure the defeat of the Townsend bill.

The Democratic members of the Rules Committee were ordered by the House leadership to report this "red-hot potato" under a "gag" rule which, by prohibiting any amendments, gives a virtual kiss of death to the proposal.

I have served in the House for almost 20 years, but I have never seen a more brazen attempt to kiss a bill to death by means of a "gag" rule. It amounts to a contemptible political hoax on 8,000,000 American aged who hoped to benefit by its passage.

I am proud to state that neither Mr. Mapes nor myself was a party to trying to bamboozle the Townsendites by voting for this iniquitous "gag" rule. By this unholy device the Townsend bill, without any real hearing before any committee or opportunity to amend and perfect it on the floor, is brought up to be slaughtered and make a Roman holiday for the Democratic leaders.

The New Deal high command, not satisfied with having arrested and caused to be sentenced to prison Dr. Townsend, an honest and upright American citizen, and a sincere champion of old-age pensions, now insists on giving the coup de grace to Dr. Townsend's plan by adding insult to injury.

There has been no study or report made on this bill. The Members are expected to be mere rubber stamps and subservient to the leadership of the House and to the President. We are offered only the right to accept or reject the pending measure, but not to amend it. In my opinion, to prevent the House from amending such far-reaching and important legislation is an act of supreme folly and political chicanery.

If this practice is continued, and the Rules Committee at the lash of the party whip employs this kind of ingenuity to gag Members of the House, they will soon destroy the usefulness of the House of Representatives as a deliberative and representative body. Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin have all said that self-government has failed in America, and that democracy is on its way out. Why not give the House a chance to demonstrate that it is capable of legislating? Why not restore representative government in the House and to the people who are our constituents? This New Deal "gag" rule is a form of dictatorship foreign to American ideals of government that makes mere puppets out of the Members of the House of Representatives. The other body would not stand for it under any circumstances, and as a member of the Rules Committee I am ashamed and humiliated at such a stultifying procedure. I am opposed to "gag" rules whether under the New Deal or Republican control.

I appeal to all Republicans and fair-minded Democrats to vote down this vicious "gag" rule and let the Members of the House offer amendments to this bill that has never been considered on its merits in any committee of the House. If the House is given an opportunity, we can write and pass a pension bill that will provide real pensions for our aged and destitute instead of deceiving them by fictitious political promises. The "gag" rule insures the defeat of years of effort by a million or more active and sincere supporters of the Townsend plan.

I deplore this humiliating spectacle of forcing such an important bill, without the benefit of a hearing, upon the Congress. It is a reflection on, and a disservice to, our free institutions and representative form of government. It makes our parliamentary system a mockery and a farce and a laughingstock for dictatorial governments. It is undemocratic and un-American practices like this that undermine popular government. We Republicans should not compromise with or be a party to such a vicious rule and abominable procedure. We Members of the House have, regardless of party affiliations, the power and the duty to vote the "gag" rule down and to serve notice on the Democratic leaders that the House refuses to make a football out of human misery.

I have been in sympathy with and a supporter of old-age pensions for many years, and introduced one of the first old-age pension measures. On May 27, 1928, just 10 years ago, I introduced a resolution in the Congress providing for the appointment by the Speaker of a committee of five Members of the House to study old-age pensions and report back its findings. I said at the time:

The purpose of my resolution is to obtain the facts upon which to consider sound, economical, and constructive legislation in order to provide some form of security for our aged and worthy poor in the evening of their lives. The sound common sense and fairness of the American people will demand the enactment of a modern system of old-age pensions as soon as the actual facts are made public. Old-age pension laws are bound to be adopted throughout the United States in the next 10 years, because they are just, and the main question to be settled will be whether they should be State or Federal enactments or a combination of both.

system of old-age pensions as soon as the actual facts are made public. Old-age pension laws are bound to be adopted throughout the United States in the next 10 years, because they are just, and the main question to be settled will be whether they should be State or Federal enactments or a combination of both. The smug and complacent man of means sometimes fails to appreciate that the wage earner is apt to be thrown out on the industrial scrap heap after he reaches his fiftieth birthday, whereas in business and in the professions or in politics men often do their best work between 50 and 60, where maturity of judgment and ripened experience are a distinct advantage. The time has come for the Federal Government to carefully examine into the feasibility and the desirability of affording financial relief to the aged poor. The United States in the last quarter of a century has become a great industrial nation. It should cease playing the ostrich act and confront or at least attempt to solve the serious problem of old-age dependency.

come for the Federal Government to carefully examine into the feasibility and the desirability of affording financial relief to the aged poor. The United States in the last quarter of a century has become a great industrial nation. It should cease playing the ostrich act and confront or at least attempt to solve the serious problem of old-age dependency.

Our present method of dealing with the aged, such as incarceration in almshouses, is antiquated, inefficient, expensive, and demoralizing. The problem of the aged cannot be ignored or postponed much longer. A constructive modern social policy must be worked out after a careful study of all the facts strictly on the basis of merit for the best interests of the American people.

I want my constituents to know my views on old-age pensions, and just what I advocate. I am in favor of a maximum old-age pension of $60 a month, to be paid to every American over 60 years of age who is out of work and worth less than $20,000. The Federal Government to pay $30 and the States to contribute $30. The Federal Government is to pay each person who qualifies $15 a month, regardless of the payment of the State's contribution. If the State pays $15, then the Federal Government will match it dollar for dollar up to a maximum of $60 a month.

The advantage of my proposal is that the aged and poor will receive $15 per month from the Federal Government, regardless of the action of the States. In other words, instead of promises and talk they would be assured of financial benefits every month. I would favor a 1-percent manufacturers sales tax to pay for these old-age pension benefits, and would make them payable this year and not at some indefinite time in the future.

If the previous question is ordered and the "gag" rule prevails, and the motion to recommit is defeated, I hope every Republican will feel free to vote his own views on the final passage of this legislation without criticism from any source. This is not a party issue. This issue of old-age pensions will not be settled until it is settled right for the benefit of all the aged citizens of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Is the gentleman in favor of the bill?

Mr. FISH. I am not in favor of it under a "gag" rule, or of any bill under a "gag" rule.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Is the gentleman in favor of the principle of this legislation?

Mr. FISH. I am in favor of old-age pension legislation.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The gentleman wants a dollarmatching proposition between the States and the Federal Government?

Mr. FISH. I just told the gentleman what I favored in the way of old-age pensions.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Will the gentleman please inform the House whether or not he is in favor of the Townsend plan?

Mr. FISH. I am not in favor of either the taxing provision or of the $200 payment in the Townsend plan, but I believe that Congress should provide more substantial oldage pensions immediately by a 1-percent manufacturers' sales tax. I believe it is wrong to bring this bill up under a "gag" rule so that we cannot amend it and do something constructive and beneficial for the aged people in this country instead of sacrificing them on the altar of New Deal politics. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to quarrel with my friend the gentleman from New York over the political speech he has just made. The test of his sincerity will come on the vote on the bill. Certainly I would not quarrel with my long-time and devoted friend the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Mapes], also one of my colleagues on the Committee on Rules. I am not even going to quarrel with him because of his criticism, mild though it may have been, of the Committee on Ways and Means for having reported the Townsend bill without recommendation, and of his own committee, that on Rules, for having reported a rule for its consideration. I would remind the gentleman, however, and the House, that the 10 Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means-and there are 10 Republican members on that committee—joined with the majority members on the committee in reporting this bill and in reporting it without recom-Those 10 Republican members of that committee mendation. joined with their colleagues in requesting a rule. They requested a closed rule, the rule that is now before the House. The ranking minority member of that committee appeared before the Committee on Rules, together with the chairman of the committee, endorsed every statement that was made by the chairman, and upon his own responsibility as the representative of his committee and of his party asked for the rule now pending.

Mr. Speaker, I have heretofore stated that the Committee on Rules felt some hesitation in reporting a closed rule. The committee is disinclined to ask the House to consider any bill under a closed rule. However, the committee is nothing but the creature of the House. The House is its master, and if the House differs with the committee on the question of judgment as to how this bill should be considered, of course, the House can vote down the previous question.

There has been some criticism of the Committee on Ways and Means, which has had this bill under consideration for a long while, for having reported the bill without recommendation and for not having accompanied the measure with a somewhat extended report in which was set forth the arguments for and against the proposal, some of the most pertinent parts of the evidence, and the opinion of the committee on its soundness. There are those who feel that the committee owed this to the House. However, the committee is here today, represented by some of its most outstanding members, to perform that duty, and these members will, if the rule is adopted, make the report of the committee during the debate on the bill. This represents their judgment as to how the question should be dealt with, and of it I make

I am sure the Members of the House appreciate and understand that the Committee on Ways and Means has had up the question of the revision of our social-security law for a good long while, and that it is certain that at an early date the committee will report a revised and liberalized social-security bill-one which will probably provide a larger sum for the aged people of this country than can possibly be produced under the revised Townsend bill.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, speaking for myself, I occupy somewhat the same position as the members of the Committee on Ways and Means. I have never been able to see that the Government could survive under the original Townsend bill. I know the present bill has been greatly modified and made less rigorous in its effect upon the country. However, I have not as yet been able to bring myself to the conclusion that it is sound legislation and would work. I am certain that to make it stand up in the courts that a constitutional amendment would be necessary. I would not be opposed to submitting such an amendment. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Ways and Means felt that since this is a measure that has claimed the attention of people all over this country, and that although it was unable to give the bill committee endorsement there was, because of the widespread interest, justification for the action it took; that is, reporting the bill without recommendation. The committee was unwilling, because of its inability to approve the bill, to deny its advocates a forum in which they might be heard. If the rule is adopted, Members will have opportunity to record their views.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolu-

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry prior to the vote on ordering the previous question.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6466) to provide for and promote the general welfare of the United States by supplying to the people a more liberal distribution and increase of purchasing power, retiring certain citizens from gainful employment, improving and stabilizing gainful employment for other citizens, stimulating agricultural and industrial production and general business, and alleviating the hazards and insecurity of old age and unemployment; to provide a method whereby citizens shall contribute to the purchase of and receive a retirement annuity; to provide for the raising of the necessary revenue to operate a continuing plan therefor; to provide for the appropriation and expenditure of such revenue; to provide for the proper administration of this act; to provide penalties for violation of the act; and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6466, with Mr. Smith of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS].

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-three Members present, a quorum.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, when I ran for Congress the first time I promised my constituents that if I were elected I would exert every effort within my power to bring the Townsend plan to the floor of the House of Representatives and that if I were successful in doing this, I would support and vote for it. I am delighted that when the day is ended I will have kept the faith with them and fulfilled my pledges.

I shall try, in the brief time which I have, to explain this plan as simply as possible. I shall not yield until I have finished my main statement, after which I shall be glad to answer any questions as far as possible.

FIRST. PENSIONS

This bill, contrary to what many think, does not provide for the amount of pensions to be paid to anyone. It simply provides for the levying of a tax, ranging from onehalf of 1 percent on certain transactions up to 2 percent on others, which as far as we are able to estimate, will pay those eligible and who would make application for the pension, between $50 and $75 to begin with, but would, if the bill accomplishes what it is designed for, increase the amount materially as time goes on. So much for the pension provision at the present time.

SECOND, TAX FEATURES

There seems to have generated in the Congress and about the country a great deal of opposition to the tax proposed in this bill. It is claimed by the opponents that the tax would stifle business and one would think at times that no such tax has ever been imposed or proposed, when, in fact, we have a similar tax in a limited way now imposed in the State of Indiana, and I understand it is working successfully. We have a still better example of the tax in Hawaii, and it has been so successful in the island that the Government finds itself in splendid financial condition, and they are contemplating reducing the tax in many instances. Results indicate that business is prospering in Hawaii instead of being stifled.

Now, as to whether this tax is a new proposal, as many seem to think it is, let me say that it is no such thing. find that such a proposal was placed before the Congress 18 years ago. The then Republican President, Warren G. Harding, in an address to a joint session of Congress, urged a prompt and thoroughgoing revision of the revenue lawsand for what purpose? For the purpose of relieving business of burdensome taxes. For the same purpose that the Ways and Means Committee is now holding hearings for a revision. You do not need to take my word for what I am about to say, for the records of the hearings are still available for your examination. The Senate Committee on Finance, on May 9, 1921, began hearings in accordance with President Harding's request. In the record of these hearings you will find that many organizations and individuals appeared and proposed a tax similar in its application to the tax we are proposing in this bill. In the records you will find that the following, not liberal but conservative organizations and individuals, appeared and testified in favor of a turn-over tax ranging from 1 to 3 percent:

The Trades Council of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia.

The legislative committee of the National Association of Real Estate Boards.

The tax committee of the National Association of Manufacturers.

The chairman of the taxation committee of the Boston Chamber of Commerce.

The Business Science Club of Philadelphia.

Roger W. Babson, president of the Babson Statistical Organizations.

The National Conference of State Manufacturers Association.

The public committee on taxes of the United States Chamber of Commerce.

There were others. So, my friends, you can see that our proposal is not entirely without example and precedent.

THIRD. RECOVERY FEATURE

Now this plan is not simply a taxation and pension plan. is essentially a national-recovery plan or it is nothing. I shall say to you, as I said to the Ways and Means Committee in testifying on this bill, that if it were merely a pension plan I would not support it, and I say that for this reason. I do not believe that we can afford to tax the American people for even four to six billion dollars which we estimate would be collected and place this in the hands of any small group of people without some definite assurances that it would be placed back into trade channels for the purpose of stimulating recovery and be of benefit to the entire American people.

In order that we may be assured that it will be of benefit to the Nation instead of to one class alone, we have placed in the bill a provision that an applicant for this pension must retire from gainful employment—and must covenant and agree to spend the annuity within the calendar month for which it is allocated.

The provision for enforced retirement from gainful employment would affect the general public, because the lowest figures on unemployment show 13,000,000 out of work. Figures which I have obtained convince me that there would be about 4,000,000 old people eligible for the pension who would retire from gainful employment, thus giving their jobs to that many of the unemployed. No one can doubt the benefit of such a result. This will still leave about eight or nine million unemployed.

Now, in regard to the enforced spending clause which has been so roundly condemned by the opponents, I should think it would be slightly embarrassing for any Member of this Congress or for anyone who has been a Member of Congress since 1932 to condemn this clause—for as a result of the collective action of the Congress we have been preaching and practicing spending to stimulate recovery, and I do not believe that the country today is taking the position that spending has not had good results. I think the quarrel is that we have not paid our way as we have spent and that we may be running into inflation, bankruptcy, and repudiation of national debts.

This bill proposes to continue spending to bring back prosperity. It proposes to place the money raised from this tax into the hands of about 8,000,000 old people who are now in need, with the understanding that they spend it each month, thereby creating a new purchasing power and placing in circulation a steady flow of money which we believe would stimulate national recovery. It differs from the present plan of spending for recovery in that it would pay its way as it goes.

At the time of our recent severe depression Mr. Marriner S. Eccles, commenting on the situation, stated that the upturn in business which we had had up to that time may be owing to the fact that the soldiers had been spending their over $2,000,000,000 bonus; and now that that was gone it may be the cause for the recession.

It is our hope that with the spending of this money and the resulting new purchasing power, that with the factory wheels turning, and industry humming that the remaining millions of unemployed can get jobs and the Government be relieved of this problem.

I hope we can all remember the simple provisions of this bill. It simply provides for the levying of a tax on transactions ranging from one-half of 1 percent to 2 percent, the proceeds of which shall be divided pro rata among those in the country above the age of 60, providing they retire from gainful employment and agree to spend the money.

In conclusion let me say that any Member may question my judgment, but I hope they will not question my sincerity. Recently a friend of mine said that since I had been in Congress he had not caught me off base but once. Upon inquiry as to the occasion he said, "On the Townsend plan." I appreciate the very friendly manner in which he told me we disagreed on this matter. But I have attended many ball games in my life and I am reminded that in every instance in my observation when a man was caught off base, he was caught attempting to score. I may be off base in this instance, and if so I will be caught in an effort to score. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am sure there are going to be many serious questions asked about this bill, and those I shall be pleased to answer in the best manner possible, but I have no intention of wasting anybody's time by answering any facetious questions.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman two questions, neither of which will be facetious.

In the first place, the gentleman stated that he would be against this bill if it were simply a pension bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Correct.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I understand the gentleman means by that if this bill were a pension bill on the basis of need; in other words, what we call an ordinary pension bill for old people in need, he would be against it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would not be against such a provision, but here is what I mean, if the gentleman will permit me to explain—and I may say that I explained that in my statement, as the gentleman would understand if he had been listening. We cannot afford to tax the American people from four to six billion dollars, which we propose in this bill shall be done, and give that to any one class without providing that they put it back into trade channels in order that it may benefit the entire Nation. I am not against pensions, and do not try to get me to say that.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman did make the positive statement.

Mr. HENDRICKS. With an explanation.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. That he would be against this bill if it was only a pension bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman still stands by that?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. What does the gentleman believe about this, when he says he does not favor taxing the people for a special group? What does he do in this bill in section 4? Does the gentleman think in his own heart that this bill is constitutional?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not say I was against taxing for a special group. Sometimes that has to be done. What is section 4?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Reading section 4, it says:

There is hereby created in the Treasury Department of the United States a fund to be known and administered as a general welfare fund.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think any one knows whether that will be constitutional until it is brought before the Supreme Court.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. That section provides what the gentleman is opposed to, namely, that a levy be made for a certain group of people.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Oh, we are on two different points. I simply mean that if we are going to collect that large tax, it must be for the benefit of the entire Nation.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I call the gentleman's attention to page 9 and the language contained in section (e)—tax on other business:

Upon every person engaging or continuing within the United States in any business, trade, occupation, or calling not included in the preceding subsections or any other provision of this act—

And so forth. Is not the gentleman of the opinion that that necessarily includes a tax on wages?

Mr. HENDRICKS. This bill does not include a tax on

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman explain to the members of the committee just what the language means, where it refers to—any business, trade, occupation, or calling-

And so forth?

Mr. HENDRICKS. This bill provides for a tax on professional services. You may call it wages if you want to—in other words, for personal services, which the proponents believe is for such services as attorneys, owners of garages, filling stations, and so forth.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. The gentleman says that it does not levy a tax on wages. I read from the bill:

Upon every person engaging or continuing in the United States in any business, trade, occupation, etc.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is for personal services, not for

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. But the gross revenue for these services would necessarily be interpreted as wages.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The gentleman may put that interpretation upon it, but we define personal services in the back of the bill and he will find that we have no intention of taxing wages, but only personal services, professional services, like the services of a lawyer, or like persons running garages and filling stations.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the gentleman is in error about this bill not taxing wages. The first Townsend bill exempted all personal services, the second Townsend bill taxed all personal services, the third and fourth Townsend bills exempted all personal services, and this bill taxes all personal services, and it has always been understood that personal services included labor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Unless they are defined otherwise. I ask the gentleman to read the definition of personal services in the bill.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Is it not true that Dr. Townsend testified that the success of his plan depended upon a pension of $200 a month?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The gentleman will have to read the record to see what he said.

Mr. HOFFMAN. But I recall what he said and I am asking the gentleman if that is not true?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The gentleman will have to read the record. I did not hear Dr. Townsend. When I finished my testimony I had to go to Florida.

Mr. HOFFMAN. He did so testify. He testified the reason they were fixing it at $200 a month was because you had to have $2,400 or $2,500 annually to make it work. Now he has abandoned the $200 a month, has he not?

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir.

Mr. HOFFMAN. He said the plan could not be successful unless it was $200 a month.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I told the gentleman I did not know what Dr. Townsend said. He speaks for himself.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Suppose he did? If he has abandoned the $200 a month, he cannot possibly have been correct in his first statement.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The gentleman would have to talk to Dr. Townsend about that. I am sure Dr. Townsend will make his position clear. I have never heard him decline to do so yet.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes.

Mr. O'BRIEN. On page 10, section 4, we find the language:

There is hereby created in the Treasury Department of the United States a fund to be known and administered as a generalwelfare fund.

Is that money to be earmarked in the Treasury to be used specifically so that these people will be the recipients of that money, or is the money to go into the Treasury precisely as in the social security?

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is put in there for the purposes set forth in this bill.

Mr. O'BRIEN. To be spent in reckless abandonment, such as the social-security money is spent?

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is to be spent for these old people. The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I yield.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman desires to be accurate. I will say to the Committee the gentleman has always been fair in appearances before the Ways and Means Committee.

I invite the gentleman's attention to page 5, line 12:

The term "gross revenue" means the gross receipts, cash or accrued, of the taxpayer received as compensation for personal services.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes.

Mr. BUCK. I invite the gentleman's attention also to page 2, line 9:

The terms "transaction" or "business transaction" as used in this title shall include all activities (personal, professional, or corporate) engaged in or caused to be engaged in with the object of gain or economic benefit, either direct or indirect,

Reading those two together, it seems to me the gentleman from Florida is mistaken when he says it does not cover wages which are paid for economic benefit and gain.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In the beginning, in drawing these bills, we did cover wages, but we placed the interpretation on "personal services" as the services of men who operate garages, filling stations, a lawyer, or that class of person, and not wages. We have no intention of including wage earners.

Mr. BUCK. But the bill does not say so. I am only reading the bill as it stands and giving it the interpretation it

Mr. HENDRICKS. The gentleman and I disagree on what "personal service" means.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Is it not a fact that the maximum amount provided in the bill is $200 a month?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SMITH of Washington. And the gentleman's estimate is that it will yield $50 or $75 a month-

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would be glad to answer every question if the opposition will yield me some of their time, but I do not have any further time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, the bill under consideration-H. R. 6466-would enact into law the Dr. Townsend scheme for business recovery and pensions to aged people. It is proposed by the Townsendites to consummate their utopian program by the imposition of a new tax.

This bill will not only impose a new tax but the heaviest tax ever levied in the history of this or any other country. The primary purpose of this tax, as expressed by the proponents of the measure, is not to pay pensions to aged people but to promote recovery—business recovery and permanent prosperity. In other words, the first purpose is not to pay pensions to aged people but is to bring about the enrichment of all people.

It will impose not only a tax—the heaviest in all historybut it would impose a tax without any reference or regard whatever to ability to pay, and pretending, I say, to promote business recovery. It is also claimed that this bill, if enacted into law, would abolish poverty, would banish the poorhouse, eliminate courts and jails. In other words, it would in effect bring the millenium. These are some of the modest claims of Dr. Townsend.

Since 1933, when the first petition was filed with Congress to pay pensions of $200 a month to aged people, the money to be raised by a transaction tax, the Townsend plan has undergone many changes, mutations, and about faces. But there is one respect in which it has undergone no change, and that is constantly dangling in the faces of old people and drumming in their ears $200 a month pension. That has been indelibly written into the minds of the aged people. Two hundred dollars a month is to be paid, regardless of need, regardless of income, or regardless of wealth. The objective of $200 a month is to be paid, regardless of need. It is to go to the rich and poor alike. Millionaire and pauper receive the same consideration and the same benefit under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. DOUGHTON. I regret that I do not have the time.

The only requirement being that persons must have arrived at the age of 60 years and they must have ceased work.

Funds to finance this program are to be obtained by levying a transaction or gross-income tax of 2 percent upon individuals, corporations, firms, partnerships, and other entities on each and every transaction, with few exceptions, except that producers, manufacturers, and wholesalers only pay one-half of 1 percent. It has been reliably estimated that the 2-percent tax would apply to 70 percent of the transactions in dollars and the one-half of 1 percent would only apply to 30 percent of transactions in dollars.

Moreover, my friends, both taxes would apply on every article over and over again, because it is a multiple tax. multiplies itself with every transaction. This pyramiding adds enormously to the iniquitous effects of the tax. No tax that I can conceive of is so unequal, so unjust, so unsound, so fanatical, so intolerable, and so inequitable. Talk about making people tax conscious. My friends, this will tax people until they are unconscious. [Laughter.] We must not lose sight of the fact that this multiple sales pay-roll tax is a superimposed tax, imposed upon all other taxes.

We must not lose sight of the fact that this multiple sales and pay-roll tax is to be superimposed upon our present tax structure, or is in addition to all other taxes levied by the Federal Government, States, counties, and local taxing units. At least, it will have the effect of doubling our Federal-tax burden, and if sufficient funds are obtained from the tax, to pay the $200 per month, and which Dr. Townsend testified was only a "starter." it will more than double the tax collections now made by all government units. Dr. Townsend even says that $300 per month is the ultimate goal. He also suggests that ultimately the national debt may be paid off out of this tax. It would impose an average tax burden upon each man, woman, and child in the United States, in addition to all other taxes now paid, of $185 per year, or more than one-third of our present per capita income of $547.

This tax would give an enormous advantage to large producers who distribute directly to the consumer, as the total tax payable with respect to any commodity varies with the number of hands through which it passes. Also to chain stores who buy direct from the manufacturers, or produce their own goods. Middlemen, in many cases, will be eliminated. Small jobbers and small merchants will be wiped out, thus fostering monopoly, as independent small businesses will be crushed and unable to compete with producers who have sufficient capital to develop retail outlets. Even Dr. Townsend admits this and states that they ought to be wiped out.

As to the actual consequences of such a plan, were it placed into operation, I desire to refer you to the testimony of cutstanding economists, businessmen, farm and labor organizations, and those who are qualified to judge as to the economic effect of the Townsend program. Among the large array of witnesses brought forward by the Townsend organization during the course of the hearings, there did not appear a single economist or recognized tax expert to support their plan. Among those appearing voluntarily before the committee and taking the position that the bill was unsound, impractical, unworkable, and dangerous were the following: Dr. Slichter, of Havard University; Dr. Frank Graham, of Princeton University; Dr. Frederic Dewhurst, of the Twentieth Century Fund; Prof. Paul Haensel, of Northwestern University; Dr. Albert Hart, of Chicago; Prof. Paul Studenski, of New York University; Dr. Harold G. Moulton, president of the Brookings Institution; Dr. Francis Tyson, of the University of Pittsburgh; and John T. Flynn and David Cushman Coyle, both economists and nationally known writers.

Representatives of business included Gerard Swope, president of General Electric; Marion B. Folsom, of Eastman Kodak Co.; also, Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor; made it clear than labor did not favor the Townsend bill or the principle underlying it.

As to its effect upon agriculture, Dr. John Lee Coulter, probably the most outstanding agricultural economist in America today, stated, in eeffct, that the adoption of the Townsend plan would be ruinous to the farmer and destructive to the entire agricultural system.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I regret I have not time.

I regret very much that I have not time to go into a fuller explanation of the bill, but I desire to read some letters I have received from those who oppose it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. DOUGHTON. I regret that I have not time, I decline to yield.

I now read a letter from Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,

Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, Washington, D. C., May 25, 1939.

Chairman, Ways and Means Committee,

House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In the federation's testimony presented on March 7, 1939, before your committee by Mr. Woll, chairman of our social-security committee, the position of the federation was clearly stated in opposition to the Townsend bills. We believe that a clear distinction must be drawn between the type of benefit which is received as a matter of right by designated beneficiaries for whom insurance programs have been established and that which is granted as relief to persons in need. The rights which have been established under the social-security laws have which have been established under the social-security laws have been primarily for persons whose economic circumstances left them prey to insecurity which the Nation wished to remove, and have been definite in respect to the funds and the amount of benefits. Although it would be a happy situation if no consideration of needs were necessary, so long as we must raise the money for whatever pensions are granted we must consider the cost. It is unreasonable to tax persons ill able to pay and give pensions to many who are already secure enough not to need assistance in their old age. in their old age.

We are convinced that to pretend to offer up to a maximum of $200 a month to all old persons regardless of need as is done by H. R. 6466 is both dishonest and undesirable. It is dishonest by H. R. 6466 is both dishonest and undesirable. It is dishonest because no such large sums could be paid to individual annuitants even with the burdensome taxes proposed. The amounts actually paid would be very much under the maximum and would fluctuate from month to month so that no real security would be achieved for those who really need it while others would receive sums entirely unnecessary in their economy.

It is undesirable because it taxes wages and gross incomes with practically no regard for ability to pay and because it offers tremendous incentive to integration of producing and marketing units at the expense of small independent business. The independent retailer, the consumer and the wage earner will be the losers under this program. A gross income tax of a flat percent cannot be other than regressive in effect. It is a thoroughly bad form of taxation. form of taxation.

The incomes of most wage-earning families are too small to justify this 2-percent income tax designed to furnish pensions for old persons regardless of need. The wage earners spend now nearly every cent of their wages. No increase in national purchasing power can be achieved by taking money from them to give to another part of the population.

The American Federation of Labor believes in enlarged social security for the Nation but achieved by reasonable methods. It condemns H. R. 2 and even more H. R. 6466 as wholly unreasonable devices and as unable to fulfill the implied extravagant promise of large pensions on the basis of which they make their appeal.

Very truly yours, S, WILLIAM GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

Hon. Robert L. Doughton,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

That is what Mr. Green has to say.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; I am sorry, I have not time.

Mr. Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, who is supposed to know the needs of the farmers and the effect this legislation would have on the farmer, has this to say:

> AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION, Chicago, Ill., May 29, 1939.

Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.
My Dear Congressman Doughton: I enclose herewith a detailed analysis of the Townsend old-age pension plan and a statement regarding the effect that such a pension system would have upon the national economy. I earnestly hope that you will give careful consideration to this statement, which I believe proves conclusively that it would be fiscal suicide for this Nation to undertake to pay old-age pensions on the scale provided for in H. R. 6466.

Sincerely yours.

EDW. A. O'NEAL

He says it will be fiscal suicide for this Nation to undertake to pay old-age pensions on the scale provided for in H. R. 6466. That is what he says.

The bill is analyzed in a detailed statement attached to Mr. O'Neal's letter. This analysis follows:

SPECIAL REPORT IN RE H. R. 6466, THE TOWNSEND OLD-AGE PENSION PLAN

WHAT BILL PROVIDES

H. R. 6466, introduced by Congressman Hendricks, and reported to the House of Representatives by the Ways and Means Committee, without recommendation, embodies in a somewhat modified form the so-called Townsend old-age pension plan.

It provides for a monthly pension of not to exceed $200 per month to every person in the United States 60 years of age or over who has been a citizen at least 5 years.

Each pensioner must agree to expend all of each month's annuity within the calendar month it is received or be subject to prosecutive to be received to the subject to prosecutive the subject to prosecutiv within the calendar month it is received or be subject to prosecution in a Federal court and upon conviction to pay a penalty equal to from one-fourth of the monthly annuity for the first conviction to forfeiture of all the annuity upon the fourth conviction.

Every person 60 years of age or over, regardless of need or financial circumstances, is entitled to the pension by filing application, and all pensioners receive the same amount, whether they are rich or poor, whether able to work or not, whether self-supporting partially dependent, or wholly dependent.

The bill makes it a misdemeanor to save any unneeded portion of the pension or for any pensioner to engage in any gainful pursuit. While the bill authorizes a maximum pension of $200 to each while the bill authorizes a maximum pension of $200 to each person, it seemingly is the intention of the bill to limit payments to the total amount of revenue derived from the taxes imposed by the bill. The monthly revenues from these taxes are to be distributed to pensioners pro rata. However, the language of the bill is not very clear as to whether the Government is free from any liability to make payments up to $200 per month when revenues are insufficient currently to make this possible.

METHOD OF FINANCING

In order to raise revenues to make these pension payments, the bill levies a tax of 2 percent on every business, trade, occupation, or calling (except those specifically designated at a lower rate) to be levied on the sales value, gross proceeds of sales, or gross revenue thereof. A rate of one-half of 1 percent is levied on all sales of tangible property of any kind made by any person as a producer; the same rate is also applied to all manufacturers, wholesalers, and jobbers. Retailers are taxed at 2 percent. All these taxes are levied upon the gross revenue, gross proceeds of sales or salers, and jobbers. Retailers are taxed at 2 percent. All these taxes are levied upon the gross revenue, gross proceeds of sales, or gross receipts of the taxpayer.

The term "gross proceeds of sale" is defined as meaning "the sales value, cash or accrued, actually proceeding from the sale of tangible property without any deductions on account of the costs of property sold or expenses of any kind."

The term "gross revenue" is defined as "the gross receipts, cash or accrued, of the taxpayer received as compensation for personal services and the gross receipts of the taxpayer derived from trade, services and the gross receipts of the taxpayer derived from trade, business, commerce, or sales, and the sales value proceeding or accruing from the sale of tangible property, or service, or both, and all receipts, actual or accrued, according to the manner in which the books of account of the taxpayer are kept, by reason which the books of account of the taxpayer are kept, by reason of the investment of the capital of the business engaged in, including interest, dividends, discount, rentals, royalties, fees, or any other emoluments however designated, and without any deductions on account of the cost of property sold, the cost of materials used, labor costs, royalties, interest or discount paid, or any other expenses whatsoever * * *." penses whatsoever

This means that every farmer, every workingman, every businessman, and every person receiving income of any kind from any source would be subject to this gross revenue tax. The only exemptions are the revenues derived from national banks, fraternal organizations, religious and educational organizations, non-profit cooperatives, building and loan associations to a certain extent, life-insurance policies, Federal tax payments, and Federal benefit

PYRAMIDING OF TAX BURDEN

Every time a commodity is sold, every time it is transported commercially, every time a wage or salary payment is made, every time an income payment is received, a tax would be levied on the time an income payment is received, a tax would be levied on the total gross amount of the sale, wage payment, or income payment, with no deductions for losses, expenses, or costs of any kind.

This means that the tax would be pyramided over and over again in the channels of trade and distribution, so that its total effects would be cumulative and would be manyfold to what appears on the surface.

pears on the surface.

It would be especially burdensome to agriculture. For example, in the case of wheat, a tax would be levied on the total wages of farm hands employed in producing the wheat; the farmer would pay a tax on the total sales value of the wheat sold to the local elevator; the elevator in turn would pay a tax on the total sales value of the wheat when sold to the terminal agency, and the latter in turn a tax on the total sales value of the wheat when sold to the mill. The mill processing the wheat into flour and byproduct feeds would pay a tax on the total sales value of these products—likewise, the wholesaler, then the local jobber, and then the retailer. Each time the product is sold the tax on the entire amount must be absorbed and the tax is thus compounded again and again. It should also be borne in mind that every time the amount must be absorbed and the tax is thus compounded again. It should also be borne in mind that every time the commodity is handled by labor and wages are paid, a tax is paid on the full amount of such wages; also that every time the commodity is transported by rail, water, or by truck for hire, the tax is paid on the cost of transportation.

All these cumulative taxes are compounded together like compounds interest. To the extent they can be passed on the con-

All these cumulative taxes are compounded together like com-pound interest. To the extent they can be passed on, the con-sumer will pay the bill in his loaf of bread; to the extent they cannot be passed on, such taxes would be passed back to the farmer in lower prices for wheat.

Similarly, in the case of cotton, at every step from the farm to the gin, to the cotton handler, to the cotton mill making cotton goods, to the dress manufacturer, to the wholesaler, to the jobber, to the retailer, and finally to the consumer—all along the line this tax is levied on the full accumulated value plus taxes at each point in the distribution process.

The same thing would be true of every commodity the farmer sells, the extent of pyramiding depending upon the complexity of the distribution process.

EXTENT OF TAX BURDEN

According to the United States Bureau of the Census, there were 10,110,000 American citizens 60 years of age and over in 1935, or about 8 percent of the total population.

It is estimated that by 1945 the total number of persons 60 years of age and older will be 15,710,000 and 24,980,000 by 1965. (Population estimates of Scripps Foundation for Research in Population lation Problems.)

To pay a pension of $200 per month to 10,000,000 persons would require an annual revenue of $24,000,000,000. In order to pay such a pension to 25,000,000 persons in 1965 would cost $60,000,000,000 annually. In establishing a pension system, it is necessary to take into account not only present costs but probable costs in the future. The above estimates show that within another 25 years, the number of persons 60 years of age and over will be more than double what it is now; and therefore the cost of such pension plan would be more than double present costs.

Various estimates indicate that the Hendricks bill as now drawn Various estimates indicate that the Hendricks bill as now drawn would fall far short of yielding sufficient revenue from the taxes levied in the bill to provide pensions of $200 per month for 10,-000,000 persons. Dr. J. Frederic Dewhurst, economist, with the Twentieth Century Fund, which made a special study of the Townsend plan, estimated that a 2-percent transactions tax as provided in H. R. 2 (a similar bill) would yield $6,179,000,000. Congressman Sheppard estimated that such a tax as provided in H. R. 11 (another similar bill) would yield $7,247,000,000 (pp. 85 and 787, hearings, House Ways and Means Committee, Social Security, 1939).

Assuming that pension payments would be limited to revenues

Assuming that pension payments would be limited to revenues derived from such taxes, the Hendricks bill would permit pension payments of $50 to $60 per month to 10,000,000 persons, according to the foregoing estimates.

It should be clearly recognized that once such a system is established there would be constant pressure to raise pensions. The advocates of such legislation have frankly and openly stated in the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee their intention to press for $200 per month pensions and ultimately $300 per month. Dr. Townsend frankly said:

"Two hundred dollars a month will not stay very long. We will go to $300. We must, inevitably" (p. 597, hearings, vol. 1, Social Security, 1939).

Pension payments of $300 per month or $3,600 per year would cost $36,000,000,000 per year for 10,000,000 persons now and by 1965 when nearly 25,000,000 persons will be eligible, it would cost $90,000,000,000 to pay them pensions of $3,600 per year.

CONCLUSIONS

Leaving out of consideration the merits or demerits of the pension features of this plan, concerning which the American Farm Bureau Federation has adopted no definite policy as yet, this proposed measure, if enacted into law, would impose upon American agriculture and the Nation a crushing tax burden which would not be a supplying the content of the which would be intolerable and which would ultimately destroy our economic system.

The tax policies adopted by the American Farm Bureau Federation in 1933 and reaffirmed with modification from time to time since, justify the Federation in condemning and opposing vigorously this proposed tax both from the standpoint of the nature of the tax and the alarming extent of the tax burden which it would place upon American agriculture.

it would place upon American agriculture.

Since early in the 1920's the American Farm Bureau has opposed the levying of a Federal sales tax by the Federal Government and has advocated the establishment of an equitable tax structure based upon ability to pay.

This proposed bill levies the most vicious form of a Federal sales tax. It proposes to tax every farmer, every worker, every person receiving income from virtually any source and the tax is levied on the total value of every transaction, every wage or salary payment, and every income payment.

salary payment, and every income payment.

The tax is not based upon ability to pay, but in fact bears heaviest upon those least able to pay. It levies the same rate upon the peor as upon the rich. Even the unemployed must pay the tax upon his food, clothing, and shelter.

Being levied upon every transaction and service again and again as commodities move through the channels of trade it is pyramided to the greatest possible extent like compound interest, by the time it reaches the consumer.

A disproportionate share of the tax would be borne by farmers A disproportionate share of the tax would be borne by farmers because much of this enormous tax burden on agricultural commodities as they move through distribution channels would be passed back to the farmer, because of the inability to pass on such enormous costs to the consumer.

It levies an additional tax burden of not less than six or seven billion dollars if the taxes are imposed as provided in the Hendricks bill. Such an additional burden of taxes at this time would be ruinous not only to agriculture but to the Nation as a whole. The total expenditures of the Federal Government for the fiscal year 1940 are estimated by the Budget Bureau at $8,995,000,000, and total revenues at $5,669,000,000. The disastrous consequences of imposing another six or seven billion dollars in taxes under such conditions should be obvious. It is generally conceded that the imposition of the moderate social-security taxes in 1937 and 1938 had a depressing effect upon the progress of recovery, yet these amounted to only about one-tenth of the total tax revenue which this bill would collect.

To provide the maximum payments of $20 per month to every person 60 years of age or over would require at least $24,000,000,000 at the present time, and approximately $60,000,000,000 by 1965. To provide the payment of a $300 pension, or $3,600, which Dr. Townsend declared as the ultimate objective of this plan, would require $90,000,000,000 by 1965.

To attempt to raise any such sums by taxation would be fantastic and would destroy any government and any nation. To attempt to raise it through inflationary borrowing would destroy the monetary and economic system of any nation attempting it. The contention of proponents of such legislation that the enforced expenditure of pension payments would cause such universal prosperity as to more than offset the effects of these enormous tax burdens cannot be systemed.

mous tax burdens, cannot be sustained.

The total number of persons eligible for such payments constitute only about 8 percent of the population. This bill transfers by taxation from six billion to a potential goal of $60,000,000,000 from 92 percent of the population under 60 years to 8 percent above that age.

It proposes to pay these pensions to all persons regardless of need, rich and poor alike, whether self-supporting, partially dependent, or wholly dependent. This means that millions of pendent, or wholly dependent. This means that millions of people who are unemployed or on relief, eking out a bare existence, will be taxed along with all the rest in order to make payments not only to the needy above 60 years of age, but to the wealthy. The millionaire and the pauper share alike in this fantastic tax orgy.

A pension of $200 per month, or $2,400 per year, means an income of $400 per month, or $4,800 per year for a married couple 60 years of age. According to a study by the Brookings Institution, 6,000,000 families (2 or more persons) in the United States, had incomes less than $1,000; 12,000,000 families, or 42 percent of all families in the United States, had incomes less than $1,500; nearly 20,000,000 families, or 71 percent, had incomes less than $2,500; and over 2,000,000 families, or 92 percent of all families, had incomes of $5,000 or less. had incomes of $5,000 or less.

had incomes of $5,000 or less.

Thus the proposed pension of $2,400 per year per person is nearly as much or more than the total income of 71 percent of all the families in the United States; and the proposed pension of $4,800 for a family of 2 persons is nearly as much or more than the total income of 92 percent of all families in the United States. Even the payments of $50 per month per person, the minimum under the Hendricks bill, would provide a family of two with $1,200 per year, which is nearly as much or more than 42 percent of the families in the United States enjoyed. (Income data from America's Capacity to Consume, Brookings Institution, data from America's Capacity to Consume, Brookings Institution,

So far as farmers are concerned, the situation is far worse, so far as farmers are concerned, the situation is far worse, when the proposed pension of $2,400 per person per year is compared with a per capita farm income which averaged only $342.15 in 1929 for the entire United States (farm cash-income data supplied by A. A. A., U. S. Department of Agriculture). On a family basis, the proposed pension of $4,800 for a family of two may be compared with the incomes of farm families; wherein, according to the Brookings study, 25 percent of all farm families received less than $500, 54 percent received less than $1,000, 89 percent received less than $2,500, and 98 percent received less than

Such a transfer of wealth would disrupt our whole economic system. It would work particular hardship upon agriculture. The old-age pensioners being required to expend the total pensions currently each month, would necessarily expend most of the increased income for nonagricultural commodities, as they would increased income for nonagricultural commodities, as they would not be able to increase very much the total consumption of food products. After all, a human being can only eat about a certain quantity no matter how much income he has. The increased consumption of cotton and wool for clothing would be limited because the group eligible for pensions amounts to only about 8 percent of the consuming public.

Because of the enormous taxes to be paid, the purchasing power of the 92 percent of consumers would be reduced. While the expenditures of the 8 percent of consumers would be large and would therefore stimulate demand for commodities bought and to that extent influence advenges in prices and create employment.

to that extent influence advances in prices and create employment.

Furthermore, the greater demand created for nonfarm goods than for farm goods probably would result in raising the prices of industrial goods more than the prices of farm commodities, with the result that the existing wide disparity between farm prices and nonfarm prices would be widened. This would mean further loss of purchasing power for farmers. This would be tempered to the extent that the increased purchases of 8 percent of the consumers resulted in increasing farm prices.

of the consumers resulted in increasing farm prices.

In short, this proposal would launch the Federal Government upon a course which imposes upon the masses of people, one of the most inequitable forms of taxation, which requires immediately as a very minimum an amount of money which would ruinous in its consequences both to agriculture and to the Nation as a whole under present circumstances, which proposes ultimate burdens to be imposed upon the people that are utterly fantastic but which if really applied would wreck our economic system and perhaps destroy our Nation, and which imposes these heavy burdens unnecessarily upon millions of people unable to bear them, in order to pay excessive and unnecessary benefits to many people who do not need such amounts. It is unnecessary to impose these heavy burdens upon all in order to provide reason-able pensions for those who really need them. Respectfully submitted.

I call particular attention to the pyramiding of the tax burden mentioned in the analysis:

Every time a commodity is sold, every time it is transported commercially, every time a wage or salary payment is made, every time an income payment is received, a tax would be levied on the total gross amount of the sale, wage payment, or income payment, with no deductions for losses, expenses, or costs of any kind.

That is one of the iniquities of this legislation. must pay a tax on his losses just the same as on his gains. On a transaction he lost $1,000 he would be taxed to the same extent and in the same way as though he had gained $1,000. Everyone knows that is an abominable, iniquitous. and unreasonable type of tax.

I have a letter here from Mr. Fred Brenckman, Washington representative of the National Grange. It reads as follows:

THE NATIONAL GRANGE, Washington, D. C., May 29, 1939.

Hon. Robert L. Doughton,

House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DOUGHTON: In response to your request for information regarding the attitude of the National Grange with reference to H. R. 6466, embodying what is commonly known as the Town-send plan, we wish to report that at one of our recent annual sessions the Grange adopted the following resolution bearing on this subject:

"Resolved, That the National Grange is opposed to any form of old-age pension which will discourage thrift and saving during the person's productive years, but strongly favors a contributory system of old-age insurance."

of old-age insurance."
In looking over H. R. 6466 we note that while the bill presents In looking over H. R. 6466 we note that while the bill presents some variations from the original plan, the objective is still the same. Dr. Townsend has been quoted in the newspapers as saying that the sum of $200 a month would be only a starter, and that if the plan were once placed in operation in due time the pension should be raised to $300 per month. The bill, as drawn, would place a tax of one-half of 1 percent upon the gross proceeds of any sale made by the producers of any product, including the products of agriculture. A like tax is placed upon manufacturers, whole-salers, or jobbers. Those engaged in any other business, trade, activity, occupation, or calling would be required to pay a tax of 2 percent upon their gross receipts. percent upon their gross receipts.

2 percent upon their gross receipts.

The revenues derived from these taxes would be placed in a separate fund, to be paid out on a monthly basis to pensioners or annuitants of both sexes over the age of 60 years, after deducting the expenses of administering the system.

It would, of course, be impossible to analyze this bill in all its ramifications in the space ordinarily devoted to a letter.

No one could furnish even an approximate estimate as to the revenues that would be derived by the imposition of the taxes imposed by the bill. However, keeping in mind the fact that the supporters of the Townsend plan aim to provide a pension of at least $200 a month for all citizens of the United States who are over 60 years of age and who are not habitual criminals, let us assume that 10,000,000 people will be eligible under the plan. This would call for taxes aggregating $24,000,000,000 a year.

This sum is equal to more than one-third of the national income during 1938. Last year our total tax bill—National, State, and lo-

This sum is equal to more than one-third of the national income during 1938. Last year our total tax bill—National, State, and local—amounted to $13,214,000,000. Last year the total taxes collected by all units of Government were equal to 23.6 percent of the national income. If the money we borrowed and spent were added to the taxes collected, it would amount to nearly one-third of the national income. How the people could be expected to pay the additional taxes called for by the Townsend plan is not clear to use

An actuary located at Minneapolis has made some careful cal-culations based on the mortality tables of the old-line insurance companies, and according to his findings if the Townsend plan, as it has been presented to the people all over the United States, were placed in operation, it would be equivalent to saddling the Federal Government with a debt or a liability of $251,000,000,000. This calculation is based on what it would cost the Government to pay $200 a month to all persons now living who are 60 years of age or older.

According to the National Industrial Conference Board, the total national wealth declined to $247,000,000,000 during the depth of the depression. We have not seen any recent estimate in this connection.

Every man who has social brains and the heart to feel for the wants of the old, the infirm, and the distressed is naturally willing that everything possible should be done to help these members of the human family. However, there is one point that must be kept firmly in mind. It is this: There can be no such thing as personal or individual security that is not based on national security. Any plan that would wreck the United States Government would surely leave each one of us stranded individually. That the Townsend plan would wreck the Government, if placed in operation, cannot be denied by anyone who will think the matter through and who is willing to look facts in the face. Among other things, it violates that sound principle of legislation which should always be kept in mind, namely, the greatest good

Among other things, it violates that sound principle of legislation which should always be kept in mind, namely, the greatest good for the greatest number. Placing our population at 130,000,000, it would tax 120,000,000 people to the point of extinction to give a joy ride to the other 10,000,000 people over 60 years of age.

According to census figures, the average farm owner of the United States is about 50 years of age. It may be assumed that his wife has lived about as long. Why should the farmer and his family, who toil from dawn until dusk, be asked to pay a part of the proceeds of every sale they make to help maintain in idleness or even luxury those who have attained the age of 60 or more? The same question may be asked with reference to those who are engaged in any other industry, vocation, or business.

There is only one basis upon which any government can endure, and that is that the people must support the government to support the people, could not fail to result in disaster.

Yours sincerely,

Yours sincerely.

THE NATIONAL GRANGE, By Fred Brenchman, Washington Representative.

You have heard what he says: That the Townsend plan would wreck the Government if placed in operation; that it would tax 120,000,000 people to the point of extinction to give a joy ride to the other 10,000,000 people over 60 years of age.

O Mr. Chairman, this bill if put into operation would break the legs of industry; it would break the back of agriculture, and it would break the neck of labor. That would be the effect of this unsound, impossible, unworkable, chimerical scheme.

I quote the following letter from the Railway Labor Executives' Association:

Hon. Robert L. Doughton,
Chairman, Ways and Means Committee,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir. I am directing your attention to bill H. R. 6466 and at the outset state definitely that the Railway Labor Executives' Association, composed of the members as indicated on the letterhead, are definitely opposed to this bill.

The language of the bill does not exempt the railroads nor the employees employed by the railroads from the taxation specified in the bill, although both the employees of the railroads and the railroads are paying a definite tax for old-age retirement and annuities.

annuities. annuities.

Under the term "exemptions," section 6, irrespective of exclusion of associations or organizations operating under the lodge system, it would still require the members of such associations or organizations to pay a tax in addition to the tax already provided for under the railroad retirement tax bill, Public, No. 174, Seventy-fifth Congress, without receiving for such taxation a proper remuneration for taxes paid.

We understand that this bill is to be considered on Wednesday, May 31, and is not subject to amendments. We therefore pray

May 31, and is not subject to amendments. We therefore pray that this bill, H. R. 6466, will be defeated since it is discriminatory in a far-reaching way with respect to the railroads and approximately 1,000,000 railroad employees.

Yours very truly,

J. G. LUHRSEN, Executive Secretary.

MY DEAR REPRESENTATIVE DOUGHTON: Thank you ever so much for your kind letter of the 25th enclosing a copy of H. R. 6466, representing the latest edition of the Townsend plan.

I cannot see that the revised bill changes the basic fallacies of the Townsend program. It merely reduces the sales tax for certain groups from 2 to one-half of 1 percent while it maintains the 2-percent tax on retail trade, wages, etc. The main defects of the Townsend program lie in the fact that—

(1) It seeks to accomplish a universal papages through a most

(1) It seeks to accomplish a universal panacea through a most regressive tax program.

(2) It attempts to set up the aged as a separate group to whom money will be given not in accordance with their needs but as agents to bring in utopia for the rest of the country.

(3) Instead of giving assured protection to the aged in need, all aged will have to depend entirely on the money available with merely the hope that they can get as much as $200. This is especially serious since the Hendricks bill abolishes the present social-security provisions which are certain and definite and substitutes for them the most uncertain and indefinite program so that even the needy may not get sufficient protection.

that even the needy may not get sufficient protection.

(4) It attempts to foist upon the country a financial obligation which the Nation may not only be unable to carry but which may destroy our entire economy.

In view of the above, I do not see that the revised bill changes the picture and I still stand by the statements I made before your committee.

I expect to be in Washington next week and, if at all possible, would appreciate your giving me a few minutes of your time on Thursday morning to discuss with you some of the committee's recommendations regarding unemployment insurance.

Dear Mr. Doughton: As requested by you in your letter of May 25, I take pleasure in sending you herewith my views on H. R. 6466, the revised version of the Townsend plan.

As a matter of possible interest in connection with your current hearings, I am also enclosing a copy of a recent series of articles I have written on taxation. In view of the study which I have made of this subject, some of my colleagues suggested that I offer to appear before the House Ways and Means Committee to present my views on Secretary Morgenthau's proposals for tax revision. I could do so late this week.

MEMORANDUM BY MERRYLE STANLEY RUKEYSER, ECONOMIC COMMENTA-TOR FOR INTERNATIONAL NEWS SERVICE, ON H. R. 6466

The latest edition of the Townsend plan, namely, H. R. 6466, seems to embrace the same old economic fallacies.

Bad legislative proposals are the children of unsound economic theory. The Townsend plan stems from the fallacious economic doctrine that the problem of prosperity is simply one of diffusing purchasing power.

There has been infinite loose thinking on this subject, especially on the part of respectable heterodox theorists.

They go haywire by making the incomplete observation that in times of depression there is less consumption than in times of prosperity. Up to that point, the observation is correct. But it by no means follows that the job of society is merely to create or subsidize additional consumers.

This misconception leads to the fantasies of social credit and the Townsend plan. Theorists of this school in effect advocate dropping dollars indiscriminately out of dirigibles in order to in-crospoint dolars indiscriminately out of dirigioles in order to increase buying power.

But such theorists are not seeing the economic problem whole. They overlook the basic fact that the exchange value of one man's production gives him the purchasing power to acquire the next fellow's production. Modern business is merely the mechanism by which specialists swap their output for the production of others in order to get the various goods and services needed for the comfort of the femily.

But if the state intervenes and arbitrarily gives purchasing power to consumers who do not produce, such consumers will become leaners on the gainfully employed.

Those on a dole or in nonproductive made work are in effect

They take goods and services out of the national heap without renewing it with a quid pro quo in the form of their own pro-

This analysis deals with the slick argument of the Townsend plan advocates that if we gave pensions up to $200 a month to those 60 or over and forced them to spend the funds within a month, the country would be promoting recovery by increasing purchasing power.

It is analogous to the argument for big foreign loans. It is urged that they provide employment, even though eventually the loans may be repudiated and this would mean giving away valuable goods to foreigners.

goods to foreigners.

If "purchasing power" theorists went to chief executives of department stores and advocated that they increase their turn-over by giving away merchandise the latter would not be greatly impressed with the "plan."

The new bill is mischievous, especially because it would repeal the provisions of the Social Security Act dealing with old-age assistance and with contributory old-age benefits. It would substitute an unscientific formula for the law which has been on the statute books since 1935 and which will be effectively revised if the sane recommendations of the House Ways and Means Committee are followed.

The Townsend Act would levy a gross income tax of 2 percent on all incomes and would also, in addition to a retail transactions tax of 2 percent, put a levy of one-half of 1 percent on manufactures, of 2 percent, put a levy of one-half of 1 percent on manufactures, agriculture, mining, and fisheries.

It would pay large benefits to the superannuated wealthy and the needy alike, exhausting younger taxpayers in order to do so. If perchance the maximum pensions should be paid, families with both spouses pensioned would receive four times the income of the average active American wage earner. The scheme would enrich the idle by transferring to them the substance earned by the self-supporting.

Ignoring the fact that existing taxes, though oppressive, are insufficient to meet the cost of government, the Townsend bill would seek to preempt the transactions tax for a new form of spending.

spending

The Townsend plan vaguely purports to offer as a maximum vastly more than the public assistance grants under the Social Security Act, which are available only to those who take a means

These are but samples of the voluminous testimony to this effect.

It is sufficient to say that the plan has been thoroughly condemned by the representatives of labor, business, agriculture, and particularly by those who are recognized as unbiased experts in the field of social security and taxation. Thus we have on one hand, a scheme which may be properly labeled as the climax of economic heresy, and is obviously the result of selfish, unintelligent, and unsound delving into a field foreign to their experience by a group of visionary amateurs, and on the other hand a well-thought-out and feasible system of social security, which our committee will report out within a day or two, which represents the best efforts made through years of study by the leading experts in that field.

The issue is clearly drawn and it is the duty of the Congress to meet it squarely, openly, and fearlessly. The issue -Shall we continue in effect the principles of social security which we have seen tried and tested, or shall we accede and surrender to the demands of crackpots, and accept a plan never before tried by any nation on earth, and one which violates every sound economic principles?

The Townsend scheme, if enacted into law, would, in my judgment, produce universal distress and national disaster, and I trust we will kill it so dead and bury it so deep that its proponents in the future will devote their time and attention to something more constructive and less dangerous.

Lastly, Mr. Chairman, I set forth as part of my remarks a table, prepared by W. L. Price, a member of the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, showing the estimated additional tax burden necessary to pay maximum pensions of $200 per month to 8,000,000 and 10,000,000 persons, based upon per capita cost computed on population of 130,000,000:

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to say that on account of the limitations of the gag rule which have been imposed in the discussion of this measure it will not be possible for me to yield.

The gentleman who just preceded me has stated on this floor that this measure comes here under an unprecedented procedure, that never before in his long service has a bill been brought here in the fashion in which this bill is brought to the floor of the House for consideration. That is a sufficient indication of the Nation-wide interest. He said, I believe, that never had he had so universal a call for consideration of a measure. This indicates that the matter transcends the ordinary procedure under which bills are here

I hold in my hand an apparently inspired story attributed to experts on the Social Security Board stating that next week we are to consider a radical revision of the Social Security Act under which we are to take in a billion dollars less and we are to pay out a billion more. At the present time we are running a deficit of approximately $4,000,000,000 a year. The question is now coming home to the American people: How much longer shall we march down the road to ruin under the leadership of a gentleman who with all his intriguing charm is ultimately going to come to be recorded in history as the Pied Piper of Hyde Park? [Applause.]

The issue is whether we shall pay as we go or continue to borrow as we go until our economy shall entirely collapse.

AMERICA MUST CHOOSE

The old-age program now before the House proposes to tax the American people to pay old-age assistance. It proposes not to pay out one cent that is not first taken in. This principle must be adopted if the Budget is ever to be balanced. Only along this road can the American system of free enterprise be salvaged from the financial chaos that now looms.

This measure repeals the pay-roll tax. This will save workers in the State of Maine $3,000,000 a year. This measure relieves the State of Maine of an annual expenditure of $1,500,000, which would be raised to $3,000,000 if all deserving citizens of Maine were put on an equality.

Today Maine contributes $3,000,000 a year to the Federal Treasury in the name of social security and gets a million back. The balance of two million is used to finance in part activities in no way related to the purpose for which the tax is paid.

This measure comes nearer than any other that has been seriously considered by this Congress to redeeming the pledge of the Republican platform of 1936 for a pay-as-you-go program of old-age assistance on a Nation-wide basis financed by a direct tax widely distributed. As that platform declared "Everyone will benefit, therefore everyone should share."

Every Republican may vote for this measure as the only way in which he is permitted to register in parliamentary procedure his conviction that old-age assistance must be put on a pay-as-you-go basis if it is not to meet inevitable collapse.

As against that program which is wrecking the finances of the country, we are here considering a measure which proposes to levy a tax and not pay out one cent that is not first taken in. Unfortunately, it is not possible for this great deliberative body to consider the details of this act. We must take it or leave it as it is. Even its chief sponsor has indicated he does not consider it a perfect measure.

We are, however, compelled to record ourselves either for one theory or the other of social security; either for the theory under which we have been functioning for the past 5 years with a constantly mounting deficit, by which payroll taxes are levied on approximately one-third of the productive workers of our Nation, and two-thirds of the proceeds are used for the purposes utterly other than that for which the tax is levied. We shall this year pay in $750,-000,000 under the pay-roll tax and $500,000,000 of that sum will be diverted to other purposes than that for which the money is paid in. Yet all this is done in the name of sanity and security.

Let us hark back to 1932 and see what they then told us about the $3,000,000,000 deficit of the Hoover administration. If that was responsible for misery and unemployment then what of the $20,000,000,000 deficit since? Yet you ask, How is this bill related to balancing the Budget? The President has told us in connection with the farm appropriation that we should not appropriate that billion dollars until we provided the funds. That principle is sound.

Mr. Chairman, here is the only instance in my experience where pressure groups of any character have come asking not primarily for an appropriation but have asked for the levying of a tax and have not asked one cent that that tax does not first produce. It requires not the wisdom of the ages to know that unless this Government soon adopts that fiscal policy and provides the necessary revenue, then we are pointed to inevitable chaos. Unemployment will much more abound as confidence continues to decline.

We are faced, and I am voting here today on the simple principle that I believe we should place old-age assistance and all the other functions of this Government on a pay-as-yougo basis and this without delay. That is the principle for which I am casting my vote today.

My friends on the other side of the aisle will not permit us to consider amendments of any kind. I should prefer that the constitutional aspects of this problem receive more consideration than they have already had. I stated before the Ways and Means Committee that I welcomed the submission of a constitutional amendment which would clarify beyond any doubt the right of this Congress not only to levy the taxes but to segregate them for specific purposes, as provided in this act. But I call your attention to the fact that the leaders of the Ways and Means Committee proclaimed within 2 weeks, according to authoritative stories, that they thought now after 3 years they have discovered a device by which they might constitutionally protect these funds against the diversion that has been a disgrace to this administration thus far. We are not yet privileged to see the constitutional device invented by these gentlemen, but if they would permit, that device would be just as much available to carrying out the provisions of this act.

This measure also replaces the pay-roll tax. It substitutes for the pay-roll tax inflicted on one-third of our workers a direct tax widely distributed in accordance with the pledge of the Republican platform of 1936. This measure favors the only concrete proposal by which, under parliamentary procedure, we on this side are permitted to record before the electorate our readiness to support a sound program of oldage essistance, financed on a pay-as-you-go basis.

This measure also provides that the funds or proceeds shall be used to buy American, not Argentine. [Applause.] That, it seems to me, must invite some favorable consideration, at least on this side of the House.

Mr. Chairman, to those who believe that an unbalanced Budget can indefinitely go on, there is nothing I can say. To those of who believe in a balanced Budget only two courses are open. Either we may discontinue old-age assistance or we must levy the taxes necessary to pay the bill. I choose the latter course. I am quite ready to cooperate with all these who believe in a balanced Budget and in continuing old-age assistance in the evolution of a program that will put our national finances in order and equitably distribute the burden of old-age care. This measure represents an honest effort to that end.

Such measures will ultimately be developed and in the not-distant future, and sound finance will be restored to the Treasury of the United States. [Applause.]

EXCERPTS FROM STATEMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE RALPH O. BREWSTER BEFORE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, ON SOCIAL SECURITY, ON FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1939

Brewster. As I understand, the committee is concerned with the problem of social security in these hearings. And it is that to which I shall address myself.

BALANCING BUDGET

I approach it from the angle of restoring us to a sound financial basis. That is my primary approach—from the standpoint of a balanced Budget—which I know this committee has historically recognized as the cornerstone on which any sound prosperity must be based.

I subscribe unequivocally to a statement which I think is profoundly true, that "too often in recent years liberal governments have been wrecked on the rocks of a locse fiscal policy," and I feel that the members of this committee, more perhaps than any other group in the Congress or in the country, will recognize the imperative necessity of getting us back to a sound finencial basis. financial basis.

There is, incidentally, also in what I shall say an aspect of assisting the States to balance their budgets, although I recognize that that is not here our primary concern. But we do realize that in recent years the Federal Government has increasingly held out the attraction of Federal grants on a matching basis and so does have a considerable measure of responsibility for the region for the proposed structure in which most of our States find them. tragic financial situation in which most of our States find themselves, as well as the Federal Government. And if we can find any measure in our action here which will check that tendency and at the same time assist in some measure the States as well to get back to a sound financial basis, I think we shall recognize we are performing a very real public service.

The program here proposed involves the social use of the taxing power which I think has been recognized almost throughout our history and is associated with the method of old-age assistance, which is one of the titles under the Social Security Act, the amendment of which we are here considering.

I have become more and more persuaded that it may only be along lines such as this that we may get back to, first, a sound financial basis and, second, meet the broadening and humanizing sense of social security which has developed in recent years.

sense of social security which has developed in recent years.

My proposal to the committee in connection with the bills now in hearing is that this may be accomplished by a program of universal old-age assistance on a pay-as-you-go basis, financed by a direct tax, universally distributed. That is the principle which I am here to advocate and which I believe may contribute very materially to the solution of many of our economic ills.

CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION

First I want to address myself to its constitutional aspects, as that was brought to our attention yesterday in connection with the pending revenue legislation, and has been brought very forcibly home by the decision in the Hoosac Mills case, where the Triple A was found to be unconstitutional because it levied a special tax for a special purpose. Hoosac Mills case, 297 U. S. 1.

I would prefer that this problem were approached from that aspect. It seems to me a sufficiently fundamental change in our economic and social functioning, to warrant a consideration of that character, and it would certainly clarify beyond any doubt any constitutional questions that may be involved.

It would also serve to lock the door against the danger of other abuses in using the Federal taxing power for a variety of other

I feel that the old-age problem may well be dignified by that constitutional recognition. I realize that it is entirely possible by apparently constitutional means, or at least by means that are not open to constitutional challenge, to accomplish perhaps the results we have in mind exactly, as did this honorable committee in the existing law. The constitutional problem is practically the same.

The committee, in the drafting of the Social Security Act and in its submission to the Congress, have recognized that problem by first providing for the various forms of social aid that are provided in the existing law, and then, in the end, simply levying a tax for general purposes. It seems probable that that may avoid constitutional challenge, not necessarily because the expenditures of the Government may constitutionally be made for the purposes provided in the act, but because no taxpayer may be able to challenge it, since the method by which the tax is levied under the decisions of the Supreme Court cannot be challenged by an individual taxpayer or by any group, unless the taxes are levied and dedicated to a specific purpose that is unconstitutional.

I should consequently prefer to see this problem approached in that way. I believe that the importance of the problem and of the method proposed for its solution warrant the deliberate consideration that is involved in a constitutional amendment. I believe that if two-thirds of the Congress and a necessary plurality of the State should come to recognize this specific problem and its solution, because of its contribution to our economic and social progress, it would mean that the people themselves, as a whole, are ready for the adoption of what in some respects seems a new departure in our economic life. We recognize, however, that the problem is a practical one. The committee, in the drafting of the Social Security Act and a new departure in our economic life. We recognize, however, that the problem is a practical one.

I think that many Members of Congress yesterday, with all honesty—I know certain members of this committee—defended their action in enacting legislation which was seemingly flatly in contravention of the decisions of the Supreme Court as to taxing State employees, because either they felt that the attitude of the Court may change as its personnel changed, or that it would enable the question to be decided. (The Court has since justified that doubt.) So that I do not feel—and I do not challenge the sincerity of any man who took that position—that we necessarily must confine ourselves to a constitutional amendment. I say simply that I would personally prefer to see a solution along that line.

PRINCIPLE INVOLVED

Now, for the provisions of the legislation, forgetting the constitutional question for a moment. I said that I propose a universal plan of old-age assistance to be distributed to everyone alike passing a certain age. I realize that is challenged on the ground of not incorporating a needs test, such as is contained in existing legislation, and such as has always commended itself to the sense of thrift as a motive for the functioning of our entire economic machine.

The objection which I have to the needs test is, first, that it results in abuses of various kinds, and in tremendous expense in administration.

INEQUITIES

Under the present law, for instance, the average payment is between $19 and $20 per person assisted. But that varies from $6 or $6.50 in Mississippi up to $27 in some States. That is a tremendous spread. It would not seem that that could reflect the needs of the individual concerned—a disproportion of such great

Second, in some States, 500 out of every 1,000 persons above the age of 65 are getting aid; in Oklahoma conspicuously. In other States it is as low as 100 or 150. On the average it is 200 per 1,000 of the eligible population. Such tremendous disparities certainly indicate a great difference in administration. In addition, local abuses are almost inevitable in administration of the needs test. In the first place, we want to be seen a such as the second seed that the second seed the second s

In addition, local abuses are almost inevitable in administra-tion of the needs test. In the first place, you must have a very large group of social-service inquisitors going about to determine the needs of all these people. It is a tremendous job.

If you had it administered by investigators, with all the wisdom of Solomon and all the sincerity of a saint, it would be a tre-mendous problem. And it must be kept constantly up to date as the recipients change and as the conditions of the individuals change. In addition, if any sectional or partisan or personal considerations enter, immediately the whole thing is thrown out of gear and tremendous social inequalities and political abuses result. We had this situation in my own State of Maine, where under the early administration of this law there were most regrettable abuses, resulting either from personal or partisan approach to the problem.

In my own district there was a great area that was of one political or high grant and it may say that it was not my persuasion. They got no old-age assistance at all. There were 25,000 people in that area and they got 10 old-age pensions, under the administration of this act. Certainly it was associated in no way with their needs, because it was one of the most needy areas of my State, and of my district. But apparently they were in the bag. They did not manage to get any aid. The administration then in power did not need to give them old-age assistance in order to secure their political to give them old-age assistance in order to secure their political support.

There was a city where one of our most distinguished citizens lived, of 20,000 population. They got 40 pensions. There was a little town in my district with 1,200 population which got 42 pensions. Now, there could be no relation between the needs of the old people in the little town of Millbridge in my district and the great city of Lewiston. What was the explanation for that disparity must be given by those responsible, but it illustrates the abuses that almost inevitably result.

It is for these reasons: First, the problem of the tremendous amount of bureaucracy, investigators and continued investigations that have led me to question the wisdom of the needs test; and that have led me to question the wisdom of the needs test; and second, the abuses which it seems to me must inevitably result.

Discriminations on the line of race, or color, or creed, or of a variety of other considerations in the administration of any human responsibility also must be considered.

The contrast is a universal system that gives assistance to everyone over a certain age, so that they merely have to establish that they are American citizens, and show that they were born at a certain date, and they automatically become eligible to participacertain date, and they automatically become engine to participation in this fund.

I realize that it was rather shocking to a great section of American public opinion when it was suggested that the needs test might be eliminated. I was one of those who hesitated long over that proposition, but the more I have seen this in operation the more fully I have become persuaded that the alternative provision of a universal old-age plan would be wise.

FORM OF TAX

Second, as to the tax: A direct tax universally distributed. realize that those who have been associated in any measure with proposals for a solution along these lines have been seriously suspected as to their economic if not their political soundness. I want to point out that one of the features of this situation which attracted me, coming from a section of the country hiswhich attracted me, coming from a section of the country his-torically devoted to sound money, was the fact that the advocates of this solution did not propose to devalue the dollar; did not propose to inflate the currency; did not propose to print green-backs or to borrow the funds. And I think that that must be recognized as very different from many proposals which would lead us down the trail to an inflation that would destroy the value, not only of our currency but of our country. not only of our currency but of our country.

They propose to tax everyone in order to help everyone as they

The words of the Republican platform are somewhat pertinent when they used this language in 1936: "All will be benefited and all should contribute," in pledging the Republican Party to the financing of old-age assistance by a—and I quote the words—"direct tax widely distributed." That was the suggestion of the platform.

Now, as to the character of the tax, a direct tax widely distributed. I am not going to undertake to educate this committee on questions of taxation, because that has been your responsibility throughout your service on this body.

We have tried a variety of ways of raising money in the upper brackets and the lower brackets and have treated it by various kinds of taxes. We have tried soaking the rich until we reached the point of diminishing returns, until now, in the past 2 years, I have heard no one in any responsible position, at least, seriously suggest that we could achieve any substantial revenues except by moving in the direction of a direct tax widely distributed.

SMOOT PROPOSAL OF 1922

I was most interested in the history of approaches to the tax problem in the last 15 years, beginning with the Smoot proposal of 1922 looking in the direction of an excise tax, and culminating in the proposal sponsored by this committee, not quite unanimously because three members signed a minority report but the remaining members of the committee on both sides in 1932 had some very definite things to say about, first, the importance of balancing the Budget and, second, the method by which it might be done.

WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE 1932

I read from the report of the committee on the revenue bill of 1932:

"It cannot be doubted, however, that any failure to balance the Budget in 1933 showing as it would a continuing failure in the face of known conditions to meet current expenditures out of current receipts would evidence such a lack of sound business methods in the conduct of our national finances as to cause a loss of confidence and apprehension as to the future.

"* * In the opinion of your committee the preservation, unimpaired, of the national credit is the most important single issue facing this country today, and it is confidently stated that this is possible only by taking those steps necessary to balance the Budget for 1933.

Budget for 1933.

"Temporary relief measures, such as the bill creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, will be to a large extent ineffective unless steps are taken to balance the Budget and maintain the national credit."

The three members of the committee who signed a minority report I think took no exception to that statement, but proposed an alternative or additional method of balancing the Budget by placing taxes upon liquor and upon beer.

For the purpose of balancing the Budget, after reviewing in this certainly very exhaustive report all the various methods which might be adopted, the committee finally settled upon the so-called manufacturers' excise tax, at the rate of 2½ percent, which was certainly a direct tax widely distributed, estimating that that would yield between five and six hundred million dollars and would make a most important contribution.

The committee reviewed in this report the reasons why they believed that was the most equitable and soundest way, from the economic standpoint, to approach this problem.

It is my judgment that nothing which has developed in the last 6 years has altered the essential soundness of the committee's then unanimous conviction that the balancing of the Budget by what amounted to direct taxes widely distributed was the only basis on which we could get back to a sound position.

You may well ask, What is the relation between that proposal and the other suggestions which have been made? Certainly they possess this in common, that both measures—I will speak more especially of H. R. 2—propose a direct tax widely distributed. That certainly fulfills the definition to that extent.

Now, the great contribution which it seems to me has been made by this agitation has been the awakening of millions of our people who might not otherwise realize the significance of this problem to by this agitation has been the awakening of millions of our people who might not otherwise realize the significance of this problem to the necessity of additional taxes if our troubles are going to be worked out. That, to me, is the greatest service that is being rendered by those who are earnestly advocating a step along these lines. And to that degree they certainly are associated not only with this committee in all its soundness but with all those conservative influences in this country who want to get us out of the mess that we are in.

'The manufacturers' excise tax, as I have understood, was adopted because of the simplicity of its collection and operation. It would involve only five to then thousand taxpayers, I believe it was estimated, so that it would be comparatively simple to operate. But that would be apparently about the limit that might be realized after the exemptions which were provided on certain things.

If substantial additional sums are to be realized, the tax must be broadened in its base, and I think the broadening of the tax base is recognized by everyone as an essential at this time.

BALANCING BUDGET

How would this contribute to the balancing of the Budget? That problem is not confined, it seems to me, simply to the tax and to the distribution. We realize that we are now running on a basis of about nine billions expenditures and six billions revenues. And in order to get a realistic approach to this, we certainly have got to cut our expenditures as well as increase our revenues. No one has seriously proposed, I believe, this year—not even the Economy League—that we could at this time cut our expenditures by $3,000,000,000 to balance the Budget. That would result in a terrific crisis, and that would be necessary to get us down to the six billions. There seems no immediate prospect that our national income will increase to the seventy or eighty billion dollars envisaged by the President in his recent Budget message within the next year or two in order to bring a balance of the Budget along that line by increased governmental revenues.

the next year or two in order to bring a balance of the Budget along that line by increased governmental revenues.

In fact, from what communications I have had with those concerned with the agricultural situation in the Government, I am told that they believe that it is going to grow very much worse in this year; that farm prices are altogether likely to fall instead of to rise, and that will mean that our national income will decline and our national revenues will decline, rather than increase.

So that it seems to me we cannot hope to balance the Budget by cutting our expenditures to fit the cloth. The alternative then is a method by attempting to increase our revenues, to meet the necessities of the country, and it has seemed to me that this proposal possessed not only the economic soundness but also the essential elements to make it possible for the country to adopt.

ELIMINATE RELIEF

In other words, it seemed to me that if we could provide in some degree adequately for the old people of this country, who were more bitterly affected than any other group by the collapse of the banking structure, destroying their savings, and by the crisis of the last 10 years, when they were approaching old age; if we could provide adequately for them so that they could get along, we might rapidly approach the day when our remaining relief problem would be very materially reduced and, perhaps, disappear.

That would come first—and this approaches the recovery aspects of the program—that would come as a result of businessmen coming to the conviction, if we could show them within the next year or two a balanced Budget, that we were back on a sound basis, that they knew what the tax problem is to be, and they were assured of something definite, and finally that the period of experimentation for a few years at least would have passed, and they were not going to be made further subjects of viviescetion.

I believe with that assurance to the industries of this country there would be a rapid revival of interest which would absorb in some measure the unemployed and reduce the problem in that regard, and would increase the national revenues otherwise.

And I have even gone to the extent of hoping it may seem entirely pertinent to the consideration by this committee in the matter of social security and a balanced Budget of what I would outline as the method by which this could be achieved.

First, levying the direct tax universally distributed to care for the old and segregating it for that purpose, so that the old people are taken apart from the rest of the population as a problem. It has then seemed to me that we might readily in the first year reduce our relief appropriation to $1,000,000,000, and I was reenforced in this by the recommendation, I believe, of the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations of the House handling that phase of appropriations, Mr. Woodrum, who, after I had made up my own figures, came out with a suggestion of $1,000,000,000 for relief. In view of his provision of that sum which he apparently considered to be adequate, I think it might well be possible to reduce this relief appropriation even more; that is, perhaps to $750,000,000. But my budget is on a basis of $1,000,000,000 as against the $2,266,000,000 provided in the current Budget that is now before the Congress.

The interest item on the national debt must remain constant at $1,650,000,000. That, of course, could not be changed at the present time.

present time.

For social security, in place of the $358,000,000, which includes $245,000,000 for old age, there would be $113,000,000 which would provide for the other items than the old-age assistance. Those would be carried along.

For the veterans, the same sum would be left, $539,000,000. The veteran would not be touched.

REDUCE COSTS 25 PERCENT

In the remaining expenditures of the Government, for all of In the remaining expenditures of the Government, for all of the bureaus and commissions and so on, I would hope to achieve a reduction there of 25 percent. It has seemed to me that in the mounting and seemingly sometimes a little irresponsible expansion of recent years, the suggestion of a 25-percent reduction in the expenditures for the other departments of the Government would certainly be feasible. If it was feasible in 1932 it certainly is feasible today. And in that way we would save the balance which would enable us to have our remaining Budget, let us call it our normal Budget, at $6,289,000,000, or a reduction of close to $3,000,000,000. That would bring our remaining Budget in balance. The remaining revenues of the Budget under existing tax laws would be adequate to care for the necessary expenses of the Government, including relief and the service of the debt and all the bureaus, and we should be able then to find ourselves once all the bureaus, and we should be able then to find ourselves once again upon a sound economic basis.

Those are the very practical approaches which I have attempted to make to this problem of getting us back on a sound track.

Now, two other items and I will be done with this statement.

RECOVERY

As to the recovery aspects of this program, I have pointed out already that in my judgment the great contribution to recovery would be through the restoration of business confidence. That is where I would expect to make great gains.

As to the redistributing of purchasing power, which is discussed, assuming our national income at sixty billions, if we take a certain portion of that national income and redistribute it to other individuals—of course, the seven to ten million old people are getting something today; they are at least surviving, so they are getting some portion of our national income. If you give them an additional portion of that income, you, of course, must take it from some source.

The turn-over of the tax on a monthly basis unquestionably would result in a stimulation of national productivity. I do not contend that it would be 100 percent. That is, if you took one or two billion dollars out each year—and turned it over once a month, you would not gain all of that amount. But you would get some effect.

VELOCITY OF MONEY

However, I rest my position primarily upon the effect on our business and economic structure as a whole. It is to be borne in mind that a great deal of our present trouble is at least associated with or indicated in the very low velocity of our money which rose as high, in 1929, in New York, as 132 times. That is, each dollar turned over that many times. In 1934 it was down to 22½. In the country as a whole it has normally been around 25 to 30. In 1929 it was up to 45. In 1933 it was down to 16 and is nearly back at that point now. I believe last year—if I remember the figures—the velocity of the dollar reached its all-time low as a result of the almost complete paralysis of business confidence. Any time anybody got hold of a dollar, they hung onto it like grim death.

Any time anybody got hold of a dollar, they hung onto it like grim death.

Certainly the assurance given in a program such as this would lead not only the old people to spend what money they had received, or would receive, but would enable the great mass of our people under the provided age to spend much more freely, if they felt assured that their old age was to be provided for.

Business, meanwhile, would go ahead with great confidence if it could feel legislative experiments were at an end and the taxation program was stabilized.

NATIONAL INCOME

Now, as the capacity to pay. The President has indicated that he hoped to see our national income go up to seventy or eighty billion dollars. Of course, when you estimate national income it is a rather difficult thing to know just how to term it; it is very easy to pyramid the national income by simply including the various stages of the distribution process. That was done in 1933. So that it is very difficult to compare the national income before 1933 with the national income since. The method of estimating national income was changed in 1933 so that it would indicate a somewhat larger income than had previously prevailed. To what extent that explains the rise in the income is not clear, but it is a

However, taking 1929 as the basis of comparison and the scale then prevailing—we were, I believe at $80,000,000,000 then—we sank to $40,000,000,000 and we are now, I believe, back to $60,000,000 through the altered system of reckoning national income. But it is to be borne in mind that the Brookings Institution which is, I think, the most conservative economic body in the country and the most thoroughly objective, has estimated that our country and the most thoroughly objective, has estimated that our present economic structure, without any undue strain, without any exhaustion of our resources, could produce not merely the $80,000,000,000 of 1929, but could produce $125,000,000,000. And that, it seems to me, is an objective, in view of the Brookings Institution survey, which we may very definitely keep in mind. And that means, as Congressman OLIVER, of Maine, pointed out, that throughout the last 10 years our national production has been not merely twenty to forty billions below 1929, but has been sixty to eighty billions below what the Brookings Institution estimated it might properly be.

it might properly be.

I am sure that every American, proud of our traditions, will want to do everything possible to get to that goal which is to me the goal they have set up. And the question is how that may be achieved.

It is my conviction that by a step along this line we may possibly cut the Gordian knot that seems too long to have impeded the progress of America to the heights that we all desire.

I think that covers my initial statement, Mr. Chairman.

MANUFACTURERS' EXCISE TAX

Mr. Cullen. Mr. Brewster, you spoke about the manufacturers' excise tax?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Mr. Cullen. Do you remember that Congress considered that in 1932?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Mr. CULLEN. On a basic rate of 2¾ percent?

Mr. BREWSTER. I thought it was 2¼ percent.

Mr. CULLEN. I stand corrected; perhaps it was 2¼ percent. The estimates submitted of prospective returns at that time were between six and seven hundred million dollars.

Mr. BREWSTER. I thought it was a little under $600,000,000;

$590,000,000, I think it was.

Mr. Cullen. Do you favor the manufacturers' excise tax, Mr. Brewster?

Mr. Brewster. I favor, as I have stated, a direct tax universally distributed. That is certainly one. I do not think it goes far enough. That is, I would go further than the manufacturers' excise tax. I would be willing to take whatever I can get, but I want to go as far as I can.

Mr. Cullen. You also remember that when it was brought to the floor of the House it was rejected?

Mr. Brewster. Yes. And I remember that the leader in the fight against that was the distinguished mayor of New York who last year vetced a bill in New York City which would have repealed the 3-percent sales tax in New York City. So I think that even Mr. LaGuardia has changed his mind, perhaps repents a little of the action he then took.

Mr. Cullen. Of course, the record shows that there was a divided

Mr. Cullen. Of course, the record shows that there was a divided vote; it was not a partisan vote?

Mr. Brewster. I have pointed out that this committee almost unanimously, with only the exception of Mr. McCormack and two others, united on that proposal.

Mr. McCormack. What proposal?

Mr. Brewster. On the manufacturers' excise tax.

Mr. McCormack. Why, I proposed it.

Mr. Brewster. Then I have been misled in this report.

Mr. McCormack. I proposed it.

Mr. Brewster. Where I am misled is that this minority report is signed by Mr. McCormack and recommends the beer tax. That was what led me astray. I am very glad to accept the gentleman is signed by Mr. McCormack and recommends the beer tax. That was what led me astray. I am very glad to accept the gentleman as an advocate, if he was.

Mr. Cullen. That is all I wish to ask. Do any other members of the committee desire to ask Mr. Brewster any questions?

Mr. McCormack. Mr. Chairman, I should like to. Mr. Brewster, I think if you will look it up, you will find that your information is incorrect. I know that you would not want to make an incorrect statement. rect statement.

Mr. Brewster. I have your report signed by you right in my hand here. It says:

"We, the undersigned members of the Committee on Ways and Means, after having heard and considered the evidence and all of the proposals for raising revenue for the Federal Government, favor the imposition of a revenue tax of $5 per barrel on beer of an alcoholic content of 2.75 percent by weight, or such other method of imposing a tax as will bring into the Treasury revenue conservatively estimated as amounting to $350,000,000."

Mr. McCormack. I think you will find that was when we had the first beer hearing and the committee did not report it out.

Mr. Brewster. No. This is incidental to the report by the committee on the revenue bill of 1932, under date of March 8. Those were the supplemental views of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCormack. I was urging that in addition to what the committee reported, because later I offered the general manufac-"We, the undersigned members of the Committee on Ways and turers' excise tax in an effort to help out the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills—to help him out of his predicament. We were raising $1,641,000,000 in 1932 in a tax bill, and the manufacturers' excise tax, with necessities of life exempted, was proposed. I joined in it. In fact, I think I was one of those—if I did not propose it, I was one of those who voted for it in the committee and later, a year or two later, I offered it as an amendment to the tax hill from the floor.

tax bill, from the floor.

Mr. Brewster. I am very glad to know that you were proposing that in addition to the manufacturers' excise tax.

PROTECT VETERANS

Mr. McCormack. Did you intend, if this bill became law, that any payments that the Government is now making to different groups should be wiped out?

Mr. Brewster. I left in my suggested balanced budget the $113,-000,000 for the other titles of social security, for the children and for the widows, and so on; and I also left $1,000,000,000 temporarily for relief purposes which I hope would be quickly eliminated.

Mr. McCormack. What do you think about the veterans?

Mr. Brewster. I left the veterans exactly as they are.

Mr. McCormack. Do you think the veteran who has been disabled overseas and who is getting anywhere from $10 or $11 a month up to over $100 a r onth according to the degree of service connection of his disability, and according to the degree of his disability, will be satisfied with this bill? What do you think his reaction should be?

Mr. Brewster. In the budget which I have suggested I left the $539,000,000 which is at present appropriated for the veterans, exactly as it was.

Mr. McCormack. Do you think they would be satisfied?

Mr. Brewster. You bring to my mind an item which I neglected

Mr. McCormack. Do you think they would be satisfied?
Mr. Brewster. You bring to my mind an item which I neglected to speak of in my or ginal statement. One of the considerations which seems to me most persuasive in this thing is that, looking ahead for the next 10 or 15 years at this problem, we have 4,000,000 veterans and their dependents; and after the experience of our last great crisis, if that experience is repeated, we are going to have an enormous increase in this pension situation. Now, if we adopt a universal system such as this, it will largely eliminate what I think everyone recognizes is otherwise likely to occur, some universal system of pensions for the veterans in their declining years. If we put everybody on that basis—and, after all, I think it is now recognized that war is totalitarian, that everybody sacrifices and contributes—if we pension everybody in this way, we are going to have a saving of $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 a year on our pension bill eventually.

pension bill eventually.

Mr. McCormack. Do you favor that with the passage of this bill the World War veterans and the Spanish War veterans be subject to the provisions of it?

Mr. Brewster. That situation will not arise for 10 to 20 years.

That is what I stated.

Mr. McCormack. The situation is here now, Governor, so far as the World War veterans are concerned.

Mr. Brewster. In my budget I provided for the veteran exactly as he is provided for now. I did not cut down his allotment at all in balancing the Budget. I did not take it out of the hide of the veteran as this administration the first year started to do. I do not know whether the gentleman voted for the Economy Act or not, but certainly they took it out of the veteran.

Not. but certainly they took it out of the veteran.

Mr. McCormack. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] for the information of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Brewster] will advise him that he voted against the Economy Act.

Mr. Brewster. I am with you, then, on the veterans. But you did not have sufficient company on your side of the House.

Mr. McCormack. I want to understand your frame of mind. You will agree that is the subject of inquiry. Do you intend ultimately that the veterans should receive the pension that is proposed in this bill?

Mr. Brewster. What I said earlier was that it seems to me that mately that the veterans should receive the pension that is proposed in this bill?

Mr. Brewster. What I said earlier was that it seems to me that this universal pension is going to save this country tremendously when the veterans of the late war get to the pensionable age. We are going to take care of them anyway; you know that. Historically, we have always done so. And if we have the provisions of this act in operation, they will certainly be on an equality with everybody else. Whether they will continue to be distinguished—certainly the men who were disabled as a result of war service would be distinguished; they would not ever be penalized because of their war service or disabilities—but whether the veterans as a whole—and you realize that that is the more serious problem; that is, the question of the disabled veterans as the result of war service is a limited group, but the 4,000,000 veterans who are aproaching the retirement age is the same sort of problem that we faced after the period of 1860.

Mr. McCormack. You realize that some World War veterans now receive a pension, do you not?

Mr. Brewster. Indeed I do.

Mr. McCormack. That is, a man who is totally and permanently disabled and whose condition is not service-connected, may be getting $30 a month or as high as $40 a month? What about that class of cases? Do you think they should continue the present pension that they are getting?

Mr. Brewster. I think whatever adjustments are necessary to save them from any prejudicial effect would be entirely war-

Mr. Brewster. I think whatever adjustments are necessary to save them from any prejudicial effect would be entirely warranted. Certainly I would not penalize the veteran. I think the gentleman perhaps exaggerates the possible effect on the cost.

BLIND PENSIONS

Mr. McCormack. We also provided for the care of the blind. Do you not think that they ought to receive the benefits of this bill?

Mr. Brewster. Yes, sir; my proposal left them provided for. Mr. McCormack. Also for dependent children. Mr. Brewsjer. One hundred and thirteen million dollars is the amount for the dependent children and the blind and other titles in the bill.

Mr. McCormack. They should receive whatever they are receiv-

Mr. BREWSTER. That is right

Mr. McCormack. They should come within the purview of this bill? Mr. Brewster. That is right. There again I thank the gentleman for the suggestion, because—

McCormack. It was not a suggestion, I was just asking

Mr. McCormack. It was not a suggestion, I was just asking you the question.

Mr. Brewster. I thank the gentleman for suggesting to my mind that in connection with the blind there will also be an ultimate saving. That is, all of the blind who are of the provided age which we are taking care of now—of course, there would not be a duplication there, and therefore there would be further savings as a result of the universal old-age plan. It would not affect the balance, I assume.

Mr. McCormack. Are there any other Federal expenditures that affect the balance, I assume.

Mr. McCormack. Are there any other Federal expenditures that you think would be saved by the passage of this bill? What about the farmer? Do you think we ought to include the farmer?

Mr. Brewster. Yes. I thank the gentleman again. Ultimately your farmer over the provided age—and up in our country we have a great many of them who are over the age limits provided, who are now receiving some benefits from the Triple A payments; if we are going to retire them from production, that will contribute to the balancing of our production through the elimination of their contributions to the markets.

Mr. McCormack. What about the farmer who has not reached.

Mr. McCormack. What about the farmer who has not reached the age limit, but who is receiving payments from the Government? Do you not think he would have some thought as to whether he should not receive $125 to $200 a month, whatever the amount is?

Mr. Brewster. I have felt that both the veteran, who has shown his patrictic and unselfish interest by being willing to sacrifice his life, and most other elements of our population, would to some extent be ready to recognize a common patrictic concern, and if it did adversely affect one or another individual, there would be that willingness to contribute which is characteristic of America in times of crisis. And I think we are in a crisis.

MOTHER'S AID

Mr. McCormack. What about the mother who has dependent children? Do you not think she should receive $200 a month, or whatever it is—$125 to $200 a month, whatever were the pension paid?

Mr. Brewster. We now have a plan to provide for mothers with dependent children. Of course, that is a constantly changing problem. They are now provided for under the Social Security Act and under the laws of most of our States.

Mr. McCormack. Would you leave them as they are, or where they are?

Mr. Brewster. If my proposal—
Mr. McCormack. Do you believe that they should stay there if this bill passes? Do you think they should stay there?
Mr. Brewster. I would be glad to see utopia on this earth and all of these delicate social problems readjusted. But I cannot all of the delicate social problems readjusted. But I cannot undertake to do it all at once. I think we must take one step at

Mr. McCormack. Do you not think that they might contend that they should come within the purview of this bill?

Mr. Brewster. I will not say what they might contend. I say simply I would not take away what they are getting, but I had not contemplated additional provision. But if the gentleman wants to advocate that, there is no objection that I can see.

Mr. McCormack. You are quite astute when you say that, but please do not try to put in my mouth those words, because I am asking you the questions. You are the witness. Do you believe they should stay the way they are at the present time?

Mr. Brewster. At the present time I am not proposing any change there. I am leaving them alone. But I do not say that some change would not be wise.

CHANGES IN BILL

Mr. Disney. Then do I understand you are here before us advocating the passage of H. R. 2 as it is now written?

Mr. Brewster. I shall be ready to vote for that if we cannot evolve something better. I want to get the benefit of this committee's studies, and anything else, but I stand for the direct tax universally distributed. And I understand this committee stood for that in 1932.

Mr. Disney. Did you propose anything better in your statement? I did not have the benefit of hearing all of it.

Mr. Brewster. I did not go into the details of the tax law, because, as I said, that is a matter for tax experts.

Mr. DISNEY. Then you are for H. R. 2?

Mr. Brewster. I said that I stand ready to vote for that if something better could not be shown me. If you can show that there are difficulties with that, or amendments to that that will in any degree improve it, I shall be happy to consider them. But up to this time we have had to spend all of our time getting to this august tribunal, and we have not been able to spend very much time on anything else. I think if we will get down to the point where we are going to consider type and character of legislation, if the gentleman stands on the principle enunciated by the committee in 1932, which was for a manufacturers' excise tax, this seems to be just a logical evolution of that position in favor of direct taxation. And I think it is the only way our economic difficulties are ever going to be solved. I hope the gentleman will direct taxation. And I think it is the only way our economic difficulties are ever going to be solved. I hope the gentleman will eventually come to that position, if he is not already there.

VETERANS UNTOUCHED

Mr. Buck. Then it would be your belief that the Spanish War veterans—and I take it that you would apply this also to the railroad men who are entitled to railroad retirement pensions that might be smaller than the old-age assistance pension; they would be included in the bill, as well as Government employees who are entitled to annuities— you would bring all of those under H. R.

entitled to annuities— you would bring all of those under H. R. 2 payments, would you not?

Mr. Brewster. As far as I have gone I would not take away from anyone an earned pension. That would apply to your Government employees. As to the veterans, I had not given further thought to that. I was thinking of the group which is going to come into being in 15 or 20 years. I think, as far as existing groups are concerned, I would not take away from them anything which they now have. I would give them the old-age allowance in addition

Mr. Buck. You would give them the old-age allowance in addition to any pension or annuity that they may be entitled to under existing law?

Mr. Beewster. That is what I have got in my budget.

Mr. Buck. That is what you have in your budget?

Mr. Brewster. That is right; in the budget. Of course, they are a comparatively small factor. It would not greatly affect the total.

Mr. Buck. That is all.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT].

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, at this particular moment I feel very much as did Hamlet when he said:

> O! that this too, too solid flesh would melt, Thaw, and resolve itself into a dew.

And again when he uttered:

The time is out of joint; O cursed spite, That ever I was born to set it right.

No Member of this body relishes or cherishes being placed on a spot politically; but the issue before us at this moment is one that must be met by each and every Member of this House, I hope, conscientiously and courageously.

Mr. Chairman, the author of this particular bill now under consideration is unknown. It is an illegitimate child, conceived in ignorance, born in obscurity, and destined for oblivion. [Applause.] The injustices and inequities contained in it, and the ambiguous verbiage, would require all the lawyers of Philadelphia to comprehend and would require stationing a policeman in every home in this country to carry out. How in the name of common sense are we to know that some old person drawing $200 a month pension does not secretly slip $10 or $20 to a son, daughter, or grandchild? Yet, should he do this, he is subjected to severe penalties, including both fine and imprisonment.

This bill taxes the very purchasing power that is essential in order to have economic recovery in this country, and it taxes you from the cradle to the grave, from the time you jump out of bed and use your tooth paste in the morning until you pull on your cotton pajamas at night. It taxes the producer one-half of 1 percent, it taxes the manufacturer one-half of 1 percent, it taxes the wholesaler and the jobber one-half of 1 percent, and then it taxes the retailer 2 percent. This tax is so pyramided that if this bill is enacted into law the American dollar will not buy 50 cents worth of goods. The farmer who exchanges a bushel of potatoes for a sack of meal is taxed just as every little merchant who will be driven out of business.

It taxes everybody in this country who earns $50 a month or more. This tax is essentially a sales tax that is blanketed upon the American people, and how in the name of God you are going to have a return of prosperity or increase the purchasing power of the masses of the laboring people of this country by taking $2 out of the pocket of John Smith, who works and toils and labors, and putting it into the pocket of Bill Jones, who is 60 years of age or more, is more than I can comprehend. You do not increase wealth, you simply rob

Peter to pay Paul. [Applause.] Wait until you hear from organized labor on this measure.

Why, this bill is not the Townsend bill as originally introduced, if I understand the history of this legislation. Dr. Townsend finished his discussion and his testimony before the powerful Committee on Ways and Means on February 17 and said that on the following day he would bring in certain necessary amendments in order to improve the legislation. Three months passed by without those amendments ever being offered. On May 17 our good friend from Florida, Mr. HENDRICKS, did introduce a bill that included the amendments submitted by Dr. Townsend, and that was H. R. 6738. Now they have brought in this monstrosity, H. R. 6466, under an airtight, ironclad, unprecedented gag rule, and they tell the Members of this House, all of us who I believe want to help the old people as much as we can, that we have to blindly close our eyes, gullibly open our mouths, and swallow hook, line, and sinker all of this nauseating and indigestible measure without crossing a "t" or dotting an "i."

Mr. COOPER rose.

Mr. SHORT. I ask you, my comrades, since when has any one man in this country, be he Dr. Townsend or anyone elseand I do not want to speak disparagingly of him-been given the power to hold a club over the heads of Members of Congress and say, "Here, you take this bill just as I have given it to you"? I predict here that the ones who swallow it will run themselves to death answering the calls of nature in the days to come. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, with pleasure I yield.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, having such a high regard for the gentleman's splendid ability of analysis, I just ask him if he has given his special attention to the paragraph on page 6, beginning in line 6, as follows.

Throughout the act the present tense includes the past and future tenses; and the future, the present. The masculine gender includes the feminine and neuter.

[Laughter.]

Mr. SHORT. Yes; I say to the gentleman that I have given it most careful consideration, but I doubt that 25 percent of the membership of this House has read this bill, yet alone made any serious attempt to analyze and attempt to understand it.

The paragraph continues:

The singular number includes the plural and the plural the singular. "Shall" means "must" and is mandatory. "May" is "permissive."

Then it goes on to state that-

All terms used in the act shall receive a liberal construction a view toward effectuating the objects of the act and promoting justice.

Mr. HENDRICKS and Mr. WHITE of Idaho rose.

Mr. SHORT. I am sorry, I have another thing or two I would like to say.

I will tell you what you are going to do when you pass this bill. You are going to throw a million and a half more Americans who are now employed out of work, and there will not be a stockbroker or a real-estate man who can function or stay in business for a week because he will have to pay a 2-percent tax on the gross value of every transaction that is made.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts. Mr. McCORMACK. As a matter of fact, Dr. Townsend admitted at the hearings that it would destroy the small and the independent business of this country, which, as we know, employs from eight to ten million workers.

Mr. SHORT. Of course, this tax will not only set up a monopoly but will squeeze the little man out of existence. National banks are exempted from this tax but State banks are not exempted, and they will not be able to keep open long. All your mortgage associations and your own agencies likewise will be taxed out of existence. Chambers of commerce are exempted but labor organizations are not exempted. The huge amounts that are received in gifts or inheritances or life-insurance policies are exempted. If you attend a ball game or a prize fight or a movie or some other place of amusement you can, of course, escape the tax if you will save the stub and make the return in sufficient time.

Listen to the severe penalties under this measure. Oh, you cannot discuss it in the limited, brief time that has been granted us. If any employee or any person willfully or knowingly, indirectly or directly, does not make a return within the limited time prescribed he is subject to $1,000 fine and imprisonment for the first offense and is subject to $20,000 fine and 5 years' imprisonment for all subsequent offenses.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a supporter of the measure?

Mr. SHORT. No; I refuse to yield.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The gentleman yields to the opponents but not the supporters of the measure.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, the thing that I regret is that during the past 6 months we have been so profligate and so foolish in vast expenditures of Government money that we have created a psychological atmosphere; we have tilled the soil in this country with such crackpot schemes and allowed them to grow and flourish that this has threatened to destroy honest and conscientious legislation.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman is so well versed in the English language, will he offer me an explanation of section 15, on page 25, which states under (c):

It shall be a misdemeanor for any annuitant to unreasonably and unnecessarily maintain any able-bodied person in idleness, or any person in drunkenness or gambling.

[Laughter.]

Will the gentleman explain that?

Mr. SHORT. Not being so well versed in all those virtues [laughter], I cannot.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SHORT. I am deeply grateful to the ranking member of the Ways and Means Committee for his unbounded generosity, and I regret that I cannot give a categorical reply to his inquiry. Since he has been so generous as to give me 5 additional minutes, I want to say a word or two about the wonderful Ways and Means Committee on which he serves.

I am very loath and reluctant to criticize any committee of this House, and, certainly, I have nothing but the highest regard, in fact, personal affection, for the distinguished and . able gentlemen who comprise the powerful Ways and Means Committee, just as I have for those other able gentlemen who are on the Rules Committee, but let me say here and now that if you would take the combined intelligence that all the Members on both of those committees have shown in reporting this measure and the rule under which it is being considered and poured that combined intelligence into a crucible you would have almost a half-wit. [Laughter.]

If that sounds a bit harsh, again I must say that I must be cruel only to be kind.

Seriously, gentlemen, you have made it impossible for us who believe in a reasonable and adequate old-age pension; and let me remind you that one of the New Deal measures I voted for, and about the only one I can recall, was the Social Security Act, and I did it reluctantly; in fact, it caused me to vomit later. However, I did it in the hope of extending some help to the old people and the crippled, as well as the children of this country, orphaned and unable to take care of themselves. I voted for social security because I believed with you gentlemen in a reasonable and adequate old-age pension. I have never pledged myself to the Townsend plan. I have never come out against it.

Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a letter which I recently have written to a constituent:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 26, 1939.

Mr. WILIAM M. BOYLAN, 530 East Highland Avenue, Carthage, Mo.

MY DEAR MR. BOYLAN: I have your card of the 24th instant, written in behalf of the bill H. R. 2, which is the Townsend plan bill. It is my understanding that this bill has been changed and a new one introduced containing the amended features, and it now bears the number H. R. 6466. The bill H. R. 6466 has been reported by the House Ways and Means Committee without recommendation, and the Rules Committee has granted a special rule for its consideration on next Wednesday, May 31. I have not yet had an opportunity to see a copy of this new bill.

However, as you may know, I have never pledged myself to yote for legislation embodying the Townsend plan, because I never However, as you may know, I have never pledged myself to vote for legislation embodying the Townsend plan, because I never have, and never will, pledge myself to support or oppose a bill for political reasons until the legislation comes before Congress in the form in which I shall have an opportunity to vote on it. However, I signed the petition on H. R. 4199 last session, as well as the letter to the Speaker, and I assume that it was because of this that the Townsend national organization voluntarily endorsed me in 1938. As you doubtless know, our district Townsend organization endorsed my Democratic opponent in the 1936 election.

in 1938. As you doubtless know, our district Townsend organization endorsed my Democratic opponent in the 1936 election.

I am anxious that the plan have full and fair discussion and consideration, and when it is before the House next week I shall bear in mind your views. Meanwhile, I shall get hold of a copy of the new bill and study it very carefully. I appreciate the support which some members of the various Townsend Clubs in the district gave me, but I have consistently stated that whether or not I had Townsend support in an election, I would and could promise, as I would promise concerning any other proposed legislation in which my constituents were interested, to endeavor to secure consideration of it, and to exercise my best judgment when it came to a vote. I want to be entirely honest about the matter, and this is the only honest promise any legislator should make.

With all good wishes, I am Sincerely yours.

DEWEY SHORT, M. C.

I cannot comprehend how any Member of this body feels that he is pledged to this particular bill, since it is a new measure, a combination of H. R. 2, the General Welfare Act, and another measure, which was presented to the Ways and Means Committee only 2 days before the bill was reported without recommendation. However, Mr. Chairman, if any Member of this body has pledged himself in advance to such a proposal, all I can say is, "Father, forgive him, for he knows not what he has done." And I might add, "Neither do I condemn you; go and sin no more."

I have many clubs in my district, and let me say that they endorsed my opponent and fought me 4 years ago. They supported me 2 years ago, and I suppose it was because I signed a petition to discharge the Ways and Means Committee and to bring that bill on the floor of the House for discussion; and I also signed the letter addressed to the Speaker in order that the American Congress and the American people could consider, under an open rule and in a fair and impartial and unprejudiced and strictly nonpartisan manner, the question of old-age pensions. I suppose that is the reason the Townsendites endorsed me and most of them voted for me 2 years ago, although they voted for my opponent 4 years ago. They are powerful in my district, and I know I may be cutting my own throat here politically, but if I never come back to this Chamber, I want you gentlemen to remember one thing that Martin Luther once uttered. He made this statement:

To act contrary to conscience is neither safe nor upright.

Mr. Chairman, this bill, it seems to me, rises above mere partisanship, and there should be no difference of opinion. As far as Republicans and Democrats in this House are concerned, I believe we have as much of the milk of human kindness in us as some of those others who are always posing as humanitarians, and perhaps some of us who do not speak often and so loudly for the old people give more out of our individual pockets than some of the loud speakers do. This bill is bad, and the rule under which it is considered worse. I voted against the previous question and I voted against the rule, and I am going to vote for a motion to recommit, which will be offered from our side, I trust.

In case that motion is defeated, I shall vote against the passage of this particular bill.

If the Ways and Means Committee would bring in a bill providing for a pension of $50 per month to every worthy person 60 years of age or over on a pay-as-you-go basis, I would be only too happy to support such a measure. The way the old people of this country have been deceived and kicked around by the professional pension racketeers and this administration is positively disgraceful. There will not be a dozen honest votes cast for this measure. Many Members on both sides of the aisle have told me that it was bad and should not be passed, and that they were voting for it only because they felt sure it would not be passed; and even should it pass the House, it would be killed in the Senate. Mr. Chairman, I cannot stultify my conscience nor resort to such a low political expediency when all kinds of morality, public, private, and political, is flowing at such a low ebb today in our national life. Such conduct is wicked and cruel. What should be done is to bring out a bill that will direct us to pay a reasonable, adequate pension to the old people of this country, and also to include helpless cripples. I have a good friend in my district, in my home town, just 2 or 3 years older than myself, with both legs off just below the hips. That man is as helpless as any old person 60 years or more, and just as much in need of assistance, and why, in the name of God, can we not write a bill in this House instead of giving the old people a run-around? You fellows who think you are taking the opponents of this bill and putting them on the spot have another think coming. I stand here today to say that the real, genuine friends of the old people of this country, who believe in paying them a pension which this Government can stand, are the real friends of the aged when they vote against this monstrous measure and will vote to bring about one that will work instead of bankrupting the Nation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Hull].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, in our own State of Wisconsin there was a well-defined interest in the old-age pension movement before the Townsend movement came into being, and before the enactment of the social-security law. Wisconsin, in fact, was among the first of the States to provide an optional form for such pensions which was put into force in several of the industrial counties. It was hoped by many when the social-security law was enacted that it might so operate as to a large part meet the demand for proper assistance for the old folks.

The widespread growth of the Townsend movement in our State clearly indicates that the social-security law has not worked out as was generally anticipated. The Townsend sentiment there is not confined to those who would be early beneficiaries under the plan. In fact, the membership is probably very largely drawn from the people who are in sympathy with a national old-age pension act who may not become direct beneficiaries for many years to come. The recovery feature of the measure appeals to thousands of people who have watched Government experiments fail in an attempt to drive away the depression and restore prosperity. They believe that the distribution of a national income in such form that millions now unable to buy and to consume will become buyers and consumers if that distribution were provided. The very deplorable situation in the dairy regions of the Northwest which is forcing thousands of farmers from their farms into villages and cities, many of them to seek positions in Government emergency activities, is lending no small influence to the increased demand for an old-age pension act which will at once assist those in advanced years and which will contribute to the general welfare of all.

One objection to the Social Security Act, especially in counties where real-estate values have fallen to a low level, and the matter of local taxation is of growing importance, is the fact that States and counties are obliged to provide one-half of the fund set aside for old-age pensions. The reduction in assessment values and of income-tax returns has been so great that both the State and its subdivisions have met with a great loss of revenues which is bothering our people in finding a solution for the growing tax problem. Twenty percent of the amount of old-age pensions is now provided by counties, and 30 percent by the State. Coupled with the demand for proper old-age assistance is that of State and local taxpayers that the Federal Government shall assume the entire cost of an old-age pension system.

There is no reason to believe that the demands of the people of our own State, or those of other States, will become less until the situation is squarely met by the Federal Government. The change of conditions of recent years which has taken away all hope of security for millions of people in their old age is a moving force which Congress must reckon with. Farm incomes and farm values have been so reduced that even those more fortunate in farming operations can look forward to no accumulation of their own capital which would permit them in their advanced years to retire from their usual activities. Many who in previous times believed that a lifetime of earnest toil and thrift would earn them a competency for such retirement now are in despair of any such accomplishment. The farmer who started out as a hired hand, or as a farm tenant, could and would make sufficient progress in previous years to acquire a comfortable homestead, rear a family, and provide the members with the comforts common to those of his community, and as age came on had a property which he could rent or dispose of. The retired farmers were numerous in villages and smaller cities, living comfortably on what they had been able to save and accumulate. That situation has largely disappeared with new conditions. Farms no longer yield that comfortable living for millions of farmers. The farmer's percentage of the national income has continued to decline and is now less than ever before. The values of farms have become so low and foreclosures so numerous that millions of farms cannot now be sold for one-half the cost of their improvements.

This present measure, commonly referred to as the Townsend bill, provides for a tax of one-half percent upon farmers, producers, and manufacturers, and 2 percent upon retailers and other lines. The funds would be prorated among those who are eligible for old-age assistance. It embodies the essential features of a national old-age pension act. It should receive the endorsement of this Congress and should be passed by the House upon this occasion. Undoubtedly faults and imperfections may be found in the measure and in the plan by its opponents. That is always the case in every form of legislation. It was true of the enactment of the social-security law, to which numerous important amendments are now pending. Such criticism, however, should not be an obstacle to the adoption of a plan which provides so much for the benefit of the old folks of the country and all others as well. Now is the time for action. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Dowell].

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill. In addition to the large number of elderly persons who will be benefited directly under the pending bill, it will furnish an opportunity for employment to a large number of the 10,000,000 or more persons now out of employment.

I have received many thousand petitions and letters from citizens and residents of the district I have the honor to represent, asking and urging the passage of this legislation.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cooper].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, it is impossible to discuss a measure of as far-reaching consequences to the American people and as important as this bill is in the brief period of 7 minutes' time, and I shall hope only to be able to point to what I think are a few salient facts that should be borne in mind in connection with the consideration of this measure. I am duly mindful of the political consequences that may be involved for some persons with respect to this measure, but as was so well indicated by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Short], it is time for us to be frank and honest with the American people when we have measures of this kind creating so much fervor and emotion among a considerable number of our people. We have this practical situation to face here today. Throughout the last several years the old people of this country have been deceived and misled with respect to this measure. They have been told all along that they would receive a pension of $200 a month. It is cruel when we think about the way the deception has been practiced upon these people, and we know that they are called upon to contribute their nickels and dimes and quarters to this movement, when many of them need that money to buy something to eat and clothes to wear. As was shown by the evidence presented to the Bell investigating committee, the Townsend movement was conceived and started as a money-making venture, and I invite your attention to the Bell committee report. On page 54 of that report you will see the findings of this committee and these four items appear on the bottom of page 54 of that report:

First. Dr. Townsend created the Townsend movement for "cold

That was the deliberate judgment and report of this special committee appointed by this House to investigate this movement and that is their finding and report to this House.

Second. Dr. Townsend was aware that the collections would not last over 2 years.

Third. Dr. Townsend employed promoters to promote the Townsend movement for financial gain.

Fourth. Dr. Townsend made the statement that there would be a "hatful" of money for those who stayed with the movement.

These are the findings of a responsible and distinguished committee of this House appointed by the House to investigate this movement. Dr. Townsend stated to the Ways and Means Committee during the hearings conducted during this session that he has taken in about $3,000,000 during the life of his movement. Other people who should be in a position to know something about it have stated that he has received a great deal more than that, some of them estimating as high as five and one-half million dollars.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. BUCK. What about the letter that Dr. Townsend admitted that he wrote, which is contained on page 638 of the hearings:

Mr. Duncan. Dcctor, I have a paper before me which purports

"I want a man who knows the King's English and who can play on the heartstrings," wrote Dr. Townsend on April 27, 1937, from California to branches in Chicago. "Weismer and Webb have both proven themselves organizers, but neither of them is the man I want as solicitor for funds. They lack the dignity and culture that should go with the function." wrote Dr. Townsend in this letter. should go with the function," wrote Dr. Townsend in this letter. "Polish, combined with a convincing logic, is required to loosen the purse strings. I haven't found the man I want for this job. So far I have been making just a short statement for the purpose of our tour and then turning the "mike" over to Webb to make an appeal for funds. He is crude and takes up too much time in getting to his point.

Is that your letter, Doctor?

Dr. Townsend. I think I wrote that. What is the purpose in introducing that?

Mr. Duncan. I just wanted to show the activities of the organization in getting the quarters and dimes.

Mr. COOPER. Thorough hearings have been held on this proposed Townsend plan on two different occasions. In 1935 thorough and complete hearings were held, and again this year a full and complete opportunity was given to everybody to appear. Dr. Townsend stated he was entirely satisfied with the hearings. It was clearly shown, as convincingly as anything I ever witnessed in my life, that this proposed Townsend plan is absolutely unsound and unworkable. A dozen of the leading economists of this Nation came in and testified that it was absolutely unsound and unworkable. I wish I had time to quote from all of them, but they appear in the hearings, and it will be interesting for all of you to read the statements that they gave.

I do want to invite your attention in passing to this statement made by Dr. Moulton, president of the Brookings Institution. This is what he said:

Two percent on transactions sounds like an innocent enough tax rate, but, if applied as intended, it would really mean a tax that would absorb from 25 to 30 percent of the total national income

I think the point that I want to emphasize most in connection with this is the magnitude of the expectations held forth to old people. Even though the figure of $2,400 is not a provision of the act, that is the figure that is in the minds of the people. That is the way it has been sold to the country. The point is this: That act, that is the figure that is in the minds of the people. That is the way it has been sold to the country. The point is this That $2,400 a year for each person, for 10,000,000 people, roughly speaking, means $24,000,000,000 of additional taxes.

Of course, that is absolutely fantastic on the face of it. The total revenues, with all of the tax machinery that we have—Federal, State, and local—is $12,000,000,000. This is double that total. It is an impossibility. It would wreck the economic system if you undertake to collect such a toy.

undertook to collect such a tax.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, that is characteristic of the evidence given us by all of the economists who came before us. Many business institutions would be destroyed by the passage of this bill. Agriculture would be very seriously and adversely affected. Labor would be seriously and adversely affected. The consumer would be seriously affected. It has been estimated a loaf of bread now costing 10 cents would cost 50 cents, and a cotton shirt now costing $1 would cost $5.

Just one other point, if I may. Consider the unfair application of the Townsend plan. For instance, a widow 45 years of age, with 6 children, left destitute, would get nothing at all, while one man, 60 years of age, strong and able-bodied, willing and able to work and now working every day, would get $200 a month. Such a proposition as that cannot be defended on any ground as fair, just, or reasonable to the American people. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I realize that there is little I can say in 3 minutes on this important measure. I realize, too, that with the limited time allowed in this debate by the Rules Committee that I have been as justly treated on the question of time as anyone could expect. About all I can do is to call attention to the speech which I will insert in the RECORD at this point.

I do not hold seven college degrees, as does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Short], but, in my judgment, the possession of college degrees does not give the holder the license and right to indulge in outright vulgarity in the greatest deliberative body in the world, as the gentleman from Missouri did a moment ago. If his speech is printed as he delivered it, the full significance of what I say will be observed.

[Applause.]

This is a time to keep our feet on the ground and meet the responsibilities resting upon us without sidestepping the issues by the profuse use of mixed metaphors and well-sounding but meaningless adjectives. This is a serious day in the Nation's history. It is serious to the millions who are in distress; it is serious to the millions who love this country and want to perpetuate it. [Applause.]

The fact that this country is in distress I need not mention, because we all admit it. We are worse off now than when I came here 5 years ago. What can be done? That should be our answer. In my judgment, viewing this matter calmly, regardless of what action we may take on our vote tomorrow. there are two things wrong in this country that will keep on making conditions worse until the Republic itself disappears in oblivion. First, we must get control of the Nation's money and credit and use it for all the people and prevent private interests from using it for their own profit. That is No. 1.

No. 2 is that having gained possession of the use of our money and credit, we must see that that money and credit

I call your attention to the bank statements of America today. Every bank is full of money, and no money is available. It means that the banking institutions of this country, using the United States money and credit and having nothing to sell to the American people, have control of us absolutely. This is the only bill before the Congress so far that compels the circulation of money month after month. Unless we face this situation, and we cannot stop it by ridicule, unless we are willing to face the facts as they are and apply this remedy of control of our money and of mandatory circulation-

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BURDICK. Read the rest of my speech in the RECORD. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it is unnecessary for me to recount the general condition of the country, except to say that unemployment haunts us; foreclosures on farms, tax deeds, and voluntary debt surrender has driven out of existence 2,000,000 farm homes since 1930; city foreclosures during the last 4 years are proceeding at a more rapid rate than did the farms; our public debt is the largest in history; it is estimated that over 60,000,000 people in the United States are in some form of distress. When we add to these conditions the fact that in this one session we have appropriated two and one-quarter billion dollars for war purposes, when there is no war in sight and cannot be if we attend to our own business, we can indeed say that the people in this country are in a sad plight.

In short. What have we done in this country as a Government that can be said to be responsible for this condition? Our natural resources are still unimpaired; there is more than a plenty for all our people and 100,000,000 more people.

It is my purpose in these precious minutes to tell this House and the country at large what has brought about this sad situation and this intense suffering among our citizens. I do not refer to contributing causes, but only to the approximate cause—that cause without which the present condition of the country would not be present. The approximate cause is our failure as a nation to stop the growth of a moneyed aristocracy in this country which defies all Government agencies, including this Congress. The prophetic words of Lincoln have come true. After he was forced by the necessity of securing finances for the prosecution of the Civil War, to grant to national banks the power to issue money, he said:

Yes, we may congratulate ourselves that this cruel war is nearing the close, but I see in the future a crisis approaching that unnerves and causes me to tremble for the safety of my country. result of the war corporations have been enthroned, and an era of corruption in high places will follow and the money power of the country will endeavor to prolong its reign by working upon the prejudices of the people until wealth is aggregated in a few hands and the Republic is destroyed. I feel at this moment more anxiety for the safety of my country than ever before in the midst of war.

This system with free Government money and credit turned over to private operators, who in turn sell it to the American people through nefarious contracts of interest, our free Government is all but consumed under the load of interest, and the people themselves are fast succumbing to the system. cannot enroll enough Members of Congress who are either independent or are not afraid of the next election to put a stop to this business. Many good men in this Congress see the situation clearly, but their constituency objects to any change, and properly speaking, these Congressmen should endeavor to carry out the wishes of the voters who sent them here. I have never charged that the fault lies entirely with Congress-it lies with the people of the United States. Just how long the money power will keep them hoodwinked or fed up with favors which only the power of credit can give, I do not know. But I assert, as a statement of principle that this Congress should immediately and without any unnecessary delay assert its control over the Nation's money and credit and prevent any individual or corporation from selling our credit to the American people under an unjust and immoral practice of usury.

Secondly, having again taken control of our money and credit to be used for all of the people; having stamped out the practice of special privilege granted to private interest to loot the Government and the people, our next step will be to make sure that what money there is in circulation actually circulates. Our condition would be infinitely better, even under the system of private control of Government credit, if the money actually in existence circulated among the people. At the present time we have an example of just what it means to have stagnant money. You can examine most any bank statement in the country and you will find the bank loaded down with money, but none available for legitimate business. The farmer and the city home owner has been shut off from the use of money for years past, but it is only of late that the businessmen of the country have met the same fate. Thousands of small-business men today and some who could qualify as big business are in danger of losing the business unless they can have access to money at nominal rates. Some businessmen have told the story of paying 35 percent for the use of money. How long will it take under these circumstances to make the whole business life of the Nation as dead as Tutankhamen after his sleep of 4,000 years?

The money of the Nation must circulate. It does not now—at least not fast enough to aid the people who need it in the business of exchange. This bill will do it. I do not know how much revenue this bill will bring in, but it is estimated that probably the annual income from the taxes proposed will yield a sum not in excess of $6,000,000,000,000 or $500,000,000 per month. Assuming that 7,000,000 of the citizens of the United States over the age of 60 would apply for and be qualified to receive the annuity, each individual would receive monthly approximately $70. This calculation is based on the present state of the national income, which is much below normal. Should the national income increase, as it will under the operation of the act, the annuity for the second year might well run up close to $100 a month.

It will be some time before a full quota of 7,000,000 will qualify for this annuity, if indeed that many ever do. First, the qualification of citizenship must be met, and in addition to that each applicant must have been a citizen at least 5 years preceding his application. At any rate, the monthly estimate of $70 may be much more, depending upon how fast applicants qualify.

Should business revive under this plan of operation, the limit of $200 per month to any individual is placed in this bill; and if the revenue raised is more than enough, it is expended for a good purpose under the terms of this bill. First, the national debt shall be paid; and finally, when that has been completed, the further revenues shall be converted into the general fund of the Government.

I am fully aware of the attacks to be made upon this act by those opposed to it. They propose to kill it by ridicule and. if that works sufficiently well, to offer a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means, with or without instructions. They may provide in the motion to recommit that the enacting clause be stricken out, or provide for some other death-stinging maneuver, but the fact is such a motion will be offered. If the motion to recommit carries. that ends the matter; and it will provide a political escape ladder for many Congressmen who are pledged to vote for this bill, but they do not want to appear ridiculous before this august body, whose leaders are determined to make this bill ridiculous. There will be, in my judgment, no vote directly on this Townsend bill. The motion to recommit will kill all chances for a direct vote. Those who have wavered in their loyalty to the people on this question can then truly say, "I did not vote against the bill; I would have voted for it if given a chance." That kind of argument is all phoney.

I caution the Townsendites to look up the RECORD on this vote and they will probably find that the Congressman who said, "I didn't vote against the bill; I would have voted for it if given a chance," did in fact vote to recommit the bill.

He can also offer a plausible argument if the motion to recommit is not too brazen. He can say that there were just a few features in the bill which he wanted corrected and of course, in order to do so, he had to vote to send the bill back to the committee. You might say then, "Why did you not offer your amendment on the floor?" That has all been fixed beforehand. This bill came out of the Rules Committee under a closed rule, which in ordinary English means that no amendments are allowed. You see, that takes care of many wavering Members and it was deliberately framed that way to do that identical thing.

The real friends of the Townsend movement in this House will vote "no" on any motion to recommit—they will offer the best that is in them to bring this matter to a direct vote before this House. That is all the people demand. If the bill then fails, the people will find out why it failed and send back in the next election Congressmen who will stand up and be counted.

Logically those who are opposed to this bill have nothing to say. If they were in any court in this country they would not be allowed to speak at all. They would be foreclosed from speaking. The principle of estoppel could be properly raised against them. They have had their day in court, and what a day it has been-it has been not a day but a night of nightmares. With distress all around us attributable directly to those who oppose this bill, we can see the ridiculous light in which the opposition is placed. The Republicans supported the Republican regime in power before this administration, and the Democrats have supported this administration; we have spent billions to put the business of this Nation in order and all has been a failure except the relief proposed by the President and approved by Congress. This was the humanitarian thing to do-it was the right thing to do. But we have offered the people on relief only a little help in the fight to sustain life. We have not reached the real objective of putting money to work at the bottom of the social heap.

It seems to me that if there is any ridicule to be indulged in it should work the best against those "superpatriots" in this House who are responsible for the condition we are in. Where can be found a sane person who does not see the abject ridicule applicable to this Congress for sitting supinely here and letting the money power use our own money and credit to further enslave the American people? Where can be found a sane person who does not in his own heart see the ridicule of appropriating two and one-quarter billion dollars for war purposes when there is no enemy in sight. Yet these superpatriots on both sides of this aisle are responsible for both situations.

Can they be heard now to say this bill will not work? Can they be heard to say they should be followed because they are men of wisdom? What is wisdom, I pray, if their actions in the past 10 years are a demonstration of what they call wisdom? We have followed them, we have listened to them, we have been guided by them—the opponents of this bill—until we are now at a point in our national life when the very foundations of this Republic are in danger. Shall we follow them further and be led over the cliff to national ruin and bankruptcy? No, sir; Mr. Chairman, I am all through following these superpatriots. I am going to follow the people and not these so-called wise men of the East.

I believe in this Government, I believe we have the framework to make this the greatest experiment of government ever dreamed of. We are the protectors of this Government, and I for one mean to protect it. I do not propose to let a band of financial brigands dismember it and cause its collapse; I do not propose to allow a banking system to be perpetuated here which locks up the money of the Nation for its own profit while the people thirst for the mere right of existence. I do not propose to let a band of men in this Congress, who are logical and wise in all things, except the real thing, control this Congress in the interest of special privilege. I mean to fight it out right here; I mean to fight against the insipid and subterranean power which now controls this Government for the money power.

I mean to take control of our money and circulate it and keep it circulating. I mean to bring back new life to this Nation. I mean to rededicate this Nation to the principles upon which it was founded. I mean to bring to every citizen of this Republic the inalienable rights of citizenshiplife, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. I mean to leave nothing undone which I am capable of doing, to pass this bill. It is a good bill; it may not do as much as should be done, but it is a start back to saneness. Time will prove our arguments, and those who stand here today armed with ridicule, invective, and sly, slick parliamentary tactics, will live long enough, I trust, to be the object of the ridicule of a happy, contented, and prosperous Nation-a Nation that guarantees fundamentals to its citizens, a Nation that grants equal opportunities to all and special privilege to none, a Nation that has no hungry men, women, or children in a land of plenty; a Nation that can maintain and defend itself by its own power of right and justice; a Nation that may continue to have the guidance of Divine Power without which ne nation can long endure.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, at this opportune time I wish to call the attention of the Members of this House to the table that shows the amount of social-security funds obtained from each State and social-security funds distributed to each State. These figures were furnished by the Social Security Board. I am sure every Member prefers to study these figures in connection with the bill-H. R. 6466-now under consideration.

In connection with the pending bill and other so-called Townsend bills, permit me to state that I did not have the Townsend blessing when I got into politics. I do not care to what party a man belongs, he has no business dodging the Townsend people or trying to do anything that would mislead them in any way. He has no right to count on help from the Townsend people if he is not willing to give them help when the time comes to give it to them. I expect to vote accordingly.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I vield 11 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Hope].

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that there is anyone in my congressional district who expects me to vote for the Townsend plan. When this measure first came up, even before the introduction of the first McGroarty bill early in 1935, I had answered inquiries from my district concerning this plan by pointing out its utter impracticability and the crushing burden of taxation which it would impose upon the workingman, the farmer, the small merchant, and others of moderate means. Since that time I have written hundreds of letters to people in my district frankly giving them the reasons why I could not support the plan. Many of these letters have been read at meetings of Townsend clubs and otherwise circulated throughout the district.

In both the 1936 and 1938 general elections I was opposed by a candidate who espoused the Townsend plan and who had the endorsement of the Townsend organization; therefore the matter has been thoroughly and fully discussed in my district, and my position is well understood.

One of the reasons why I felt it imperative to make by position clear on this matter from the very beginning was because of the fact that I did not want to be a party, either actively or passively, to the deception, either wittingly or unwittingly, in good faith or bad, which has been carried on on behalf of this measure among the fine elderly people of this country. The growth of the Townsend pension program offers perhaps the most conspicuous example of the power of skillful propaganda which has ever been afforded in this country.

I do not want to question the good faith of all of those who have been guilty of deceiving millions of elderly people in this country into believing that it was possible for the Federal Government to pay them up to $200 per month without cost to anyone. The fact remains, however, that this impossible proposal has been the theme song of paid Townsend organizers and workers since the beginning of the movement and is today being held out to the elderly people of this country not only as the objective of the program but as something that was going to ultimately be brought about

Since the introduction of the first McGroarty bill early in 1936, there have been at least four other bills which have been sponsored by the Townsend organization, to say nothing of the bills sponsored by other pension groups. new bills have been introduced, because even the sponsors of the earlier legislation conceded that it could not work. Yet the Townsend organizers and lecturers have, on the occasion of the introduction of everyone of these bills, informed the members of the organization that they were perfect bills and that they should importune Members of Congress to pass them without amendment.

The publicity and discussion which has occurred throughout the country with respect to these measures has, of course, demonstrated clearly that there is no possible way by which a tax can be levied upon the American people which would result in payments of $200 per month to all those over 60 years of age. Yet that has not in any degree resulted in a change in the propaganda of the organization, and this inducement is still being held out to the duespaying members of the organization in order to keep the money coming in for the benefit of the officers, organizers, speakers, and other paid employees of the movement.

I call attention to the column carried in every issue of the Townsend National Weekly, including that which is dated Friday, June 2, 1939, entitled "Townsend plan in capsule form," where the $200 is still put forth in the following language:

Revolving effects of the plan will be apparent within 30 days to 90 days. As transactions increase, tax revenues will mount and the prorated share of the spending agents will grow, to be again spent within 30 days.

spent within 30 days.

Continued increase in business will reduce unemployment rolls to a minimum. Continued increase in the tax return will add to the annuitants' pro rata share until a maximum of $200 each was being distributed monthly. At that time revenue beyond this figure can be used to reduce the national debt, or eliminate other taxes, or both.

All this notwithstanding the fact that members of the organization, when questioned concerning the matter, frankly admit that the taxes provided for in the present bill will not raise enough money to pay even one-fourth of such an amount. The fact is, if competent economists are to be believed, the provisions of the bill which is before us now would probably not raise sufficient funds to pay one-eighth of $200 per month. It is wrong to deceive the splendid elderly people of this country in such a fashion. Congress ought not to be a party to it. We ought to vote this bill down by such a vote that the elderly people of this country will understand that it is not possible to do what the sponsors of this legislation claim it will do.

Any fair analysis of the present bill, or any other of the bills embodying this plan, will quickly demonstrate that the plan is unsound, that it is unworkable and cannot possibly do what its sponsors claim for it. If the plan will work as the sponsors claim, then it means that it is possible in this world to get something for nothing, which the accumulated experience of generations of mankind has proven cannot be done. Yet that is the theory upon which this plan is being sold to the public. From the very beginning, the paid organizers and workers for the plan have based their arguments on the theory that the plan would cost nothing and that it is possible to pay out to the elderly people of this country as much as $20,000,000,000 per year without its actually having to come out of anyone's pocket.

The theory of the bill as expounded by its supporters is that by levying a tax it is possible to accelerate the circulation of money. Strangely enough, if this is the theory, the tax is to be levied not upon idle money or hoarded money which is out of circulation but upon money which is already actually in circulation. It is a tax to be levied upon business transactions so that every penny which would, by means of this tax, be diverted to pension payments is a penny taken away from someone who was actually preparing to spend it at the time it was taken away by taxation. In other words, all the transaction tax does is to take the dollar that is being spent for goods and commodities and divert a part of it to the Federal Government in the form of a tax. The man who is about to spend a dollar gets 98 cents worth of goods and the Government gets 2 cents in tax. Later, presumably some elderly person will receive the 2 cents and spend it. Exactly the same amount of money is circulated. The only difference is that in one case it would have been spent by the man who worked for it and earned it, and in the second case, it is spent by the man to whom it is paid as a pension. A transactions tax is a particularly vicious tax, because it bears down most heavily upon the poor. The people who have to pay the Townsend tax are the farmer, the small-business man, the working man, those on relief-in short, the 97 percent of our population who may be classified as poor or of moderate means. They are the people who are doing the work in this country, who are raising the families, producing the goods and creating the wealth. Yet, under this program, a man on relief would have to contribute a part of his meager return in the form of taxation. The farmer who is losing his farm would be taxed, and the small retail merchant who is just able to keep his head above water in the face of increasing chain-store competition would be assessed for his share. In fact, it seems very apparent that, under the present bill or any bill which includes a transactions tax or a gross-income tax, the small retail merchant will be placed at a much greater disadvantage as compared with the chain store, and small business institutions of all kinds will be forced out of the picture.

In the main, of course, this tax will be borne by the consumer, but in other cases competitive conditions may force it to be absorbed by the businessman and thus impose an additional handicap upon small business. Furthermore, if the history of taxation is any criterion, we can expect this tax to slow up business rather than accelerate it, thus not only reducing the amount of money in circulation but providing a decreasing scale of revenue. In view of these facts, which are admitted by all economists and which have not and cannot be controverted by the sponsors of this plan, is it not time that Members of Congress do their part in informing the people of this country that there is no way through legislation by which black can be changed to white, by which 2 and 2 can be made to add up 40 instead of 4, or by which people can get something for nothing?

The main reason that the Townsend plan has gained such a large following is because of the fact that the skillful propaganda of the paid organizers for the plan has been allowed to go unanswered and unchallenged. I have heard Townsend organizers frequently make the statement that there is no answer to the plan, that those who oppose it can give no good reason for doing so, and that their only reason for opposing the plan is because sinister money interests are against it. This bill is not going to hurt the moneyed interests of the country. It is not going to hurt the rich man who, after all, spends a very small part of his income. It will not touch a penny of hoarded capital. The men and women who will be hurt by it are in that great class composed of those who must of necessity spend all of their earnings for living expenses.

Yet I am confident that these facts have not been brought to the attention of the public generally. That is partly our fault. It is partly the fault of the press and of other avenues of information. With the high regard which I have for the fairness and intelligence of the American people, I am convinced that when this proposal is put up to them in its true light and in a fair way they will be overwhelmingly against it.

No one can carefully study the voluminous hearings which have been conducted on this measure without reaching the conclusion that every claim which has been made for this plan is false and that, instead of contributing to recovery, its adoption would be the greatest catastrophe which could happen to this country. Instead of doing what its sponsors claim it would do, the adoption of this plan would decrease the circulation of money and curtail business activity, because it is a tax imposed upon business activities and because it gives to one in the way of pension benefits what it takes away from another in the form of a tax. There is no way by which increased purchasing power can be developed except through the increased production of goods and wealth.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield briefly.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman from Kansas represents an agricultural district as I do.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BUCK. I call the gentleman's attention to page 1002, where the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] was interrogating Dr. Coulter, former president of the North Dakota Agricultural and Mechanical College:

Mr. McCormack. Doctor, just one or two questions. It is your opinion that the passage of the Townsend Act, or similar legislation, would be disastrous to agriculture, confining my question to that activity in the country?

Dr. COULTER. Yes; I think it would be very burdensome.

Mr. McCormack. By burdensome, you mean it would be destructive?

Mr. McCormack Any Member who voted for this bill, who comes from an agricultural district, would be voting directly contrary to the best interests of the people of his district?

Dr. COULTER. I think so.

Mr. HOPE. I appreciate the gentleman's contribution; and, of course, I agree with what the gentleman says 100

The adoption of this plan will decrease rather than increase employment. It is true that if the pension were large enough it might result in elderly people giving up their employment and transferring their jobs to those in lower age groups. No new jobs would be created, however, and it is generally felt by those who have made a study of the matter that it would probably result in a net decrease in employment because many elderly people are employed because of their long and faithful service, and if they should retire, their places in many instances would not be filled.

The plan will ruin the small-business man and the independent merchant because chain stores and large business institutions will be able to avoid a part of any transactions or gross income tax due to the absence of middlemen or jobbers in connection with their operations.

The plan will impose an intolerable tax upon the consumer, which means upon the poor man. Everything he buys will cost more because of the tax, and his wages will be decreased because he will have to pay a tax upon them.

The adoption of this plan would prevent the development of a sound, workable pension, because any pension system to be successful must be based upon pension principles and not be tied up with an unworkable so-called recovery plan.

The sponsors of this legislation have a low opinion of Congress. I might say they have a contempt of Congress, because they believe that legislation in this body is not considered on its merits or because of its merits, but because of the amount of mass pressure which can be placed behind it. That is the theme of the entire Townsend drive. Its proponents do not offer arguments. They even tell their followers not to argue the question with anyone but that the thing to do is to bring all possible threats and pressure against the Members of Congress in order to induce them to vote for the measure, irrespective of its merits. No one can read the arguments which were made before the Committee on Ways and Means on behalf of the Townsend plan without being convinced of their pitiful weakness and utter lack of logic and sound economic basis.

I think that the vote on this bill offers the Members of Congress a splendid occasion to demonstrate to the people of this country that we are not influenced by mass pressure irrespective of the merits of legislation. If this bill is voted down overwhelmingly, it will result in increased confidence in Congress on the part of the people of this country and to that extent will contribute to business recovery. On the other hand if this measure should receive a large vote today, it will lower this great body in the estimation of the people of this country and will create a feeling of distrust and suspicion which cannot help but undermine confidence.

I have only the kindest and most sympathetic feeling for the splendid elderly people of this country, many of whom are supporting this plan. I want to see a sound, workable system of old-age insurance worked out for their benefit. Like all other great movements, however, whatever may be done must be done slowly and developed through experience. I am sure that is what the elderly people of this country want. Many of them have been induced to support the Townsend plan because of the misrepresentations that have been made and are still being made by its officers and organizers. No matter how good the original intentions of its founders may have been, by this time they know and must admit that there is no way by which pensions of up to $200 per month may be paid without costing anyone anything.

Yet that fraud is being carried on today in the columns of the Townsend Weekly, and the bill before us solemnly provides that payments shall be made to annuitants in an amount not exceeding $200 per month, and that any surplus shall be "used by the Secretary of the Treasury in liquidation of the national debt until same is cleared after which it shall go into the general fund." The Congress of the United States ought not to be a party to any program which gives such a false and fraudulent impression. We ought not to be accomplices to this program of deception which is being practiced upon the elderly people of this country who have a right to look to Congress to deal with them justly and in good faith. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House again, to page 6, line 6, of the bill, to that section which you consider ridiculous. I am the one to be embarrassed, but I have never assumed the mistaken sense of omniscience or perfection that some Members might

I hold in my hand the present Labor Code of California with this section in it verbatim. In addition to that it is in 200 important laws in California which are on the statute books, and a portion of this same language is in the United States Code. There are two other bills in this House at this time which carry the identical provision.

I wrote to the man who drew this bill to find out why the language was in it and I read a paragraph from that letter which will explain his reason.

In order to make perfectly clear, as an attorney admitted to practice before the United States Supreme Court and all the courts of California and the District of Columbia, the purpose the section California and the District of Columbia, the purpose the section serves, let me call attention to the fact that many statutes use the future tense "shall be." The section in question makes it clear that this means "is." Many statutes use the pronoun "he" and if this section is not in the statute a grave question arises as to whether a woman affected would be governed thereby without repeating "he or she," also whether a corporation would be included under the term without using the pronoun "it." Questions have often arisen in court as to whether the plural number used in a statute refers to just one person and some mighty important in a statute refers to just one person and some mighty important cases have been taken to our higher courts on whether "shall" means "must" and is mandatory. To prevent litigation, which the needy poor oftentimes cannot carry on, this section was inserted.

If any Members further insist on my helping them to expose their ignorance, they cannot complain if I attempt to accommodate them.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I thank the gentleman. I have not sufficient time to discuss the bill in detail. I want to call the attention of the Members to two or three matters.

It has been contended upon this floor this afternoon, and seriously if you please, that this measure if enacted into the laws of this country would bankrupt the Government. Remember, Mr. Chairman, that it does not bring into being a new department to enforce its provisions, it is enforced through the mechanics of the Bureau of Internal Revenue and without expense to the United States Government except a slight increase in costs of collection. In addition to that, they say the enactment of this law will break the country. Remember every dollar that is taken out in the form of taxation goes back into the country in the channels of trade every 30 days after it is collected; so it will not break the Government, and it will not break the country.

Mr. Chairman, whose eyes are turned toward Washington and upon the House of Representatives this afternoon? Are they the eyes of the rich? Mr. Chairman, no it is the old people throughout the United States who have been forced to live upon from $6 to $15 a month, living almost like animals, if you please, who today from the East and West, from the North and South, are looking to this body to see whether or not we are going to compel them to continue to live in the future as we have compelled them to live in the past. We have had a lot of fun here this afternoon. I thought our distinguished friend from Missouri was going to burst a hame string in ridiculing this measure designed to help the needy. Yes, Mr. Chairman, we can have fun here, we can laugh here this afternoon, but we are laughing at the expense of humanity in this country, of the men and women of this country who are in need and with tears in their eyes looking to us.

They say that millions of the people who followed Dr. Townsend have done so through false propaganda. That is not true, Mr. Chairman; they have followed him because they feel that they are in need and something must be done. That is why they are prepared to follow this man.

We cannot do less here this afternoon than go along and meet the call of the old and needy people of this country.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, some people say that the Townsend plan is fallacious; but, in my judgment, the American people are indebted deeply to Dr. Townsend for the campaign that he conducted, calling to the attention of Congress and the American people the deplorable conditions that exist throughout the country. I think they will always owe to him a debt of gratitude.

And, Mr. Chairman, I am going to refer to a gentleman who has departed this life, for whose memory each and every Member of Congress has a deep reverence. That was Senator Thomas J. Walsh, of Montana. I happened to be visiting at his summer home at Glacier Park sometime in 1931, I think it was, and he was preparing a speech to be delivered before the chamber of commerce in San Francisco. He was pointing out in that speech the human needs of this country. He stated in the speech that there was "no surplus beyond human needs in the United States but there was a surplus beyond market demands."

Now, in my opinion, gentlemen, that is related to the subject at hand. It is distribution today that is wrong with the country. Somehow or other we have lost the key. Our markets are glutted with the necessities of life, and at the same time we have our hungry people, our ill-clothed people, and ill-housed people. I think the President of the United States was right when he made the statement that one-third of the people in this country were ill-fed, ill-housed, and ill-clothed. The Social Security Act is not adequate.

The present Social Security Act is based upon pay rolls. I see no hope of relief for the man who has no employment, who is not on any pay roll, in the present social-security set-up. Some time ago I engaged in an argument with my distinguished friend, Congressman McCormack. And I do not speak lightly when I refer to him as my friend.

I made the statement that I wanted to know if taxexempt securities were going to be taxed or if we were going to have a chance to vote upon that before taking up a discussion of a bill providing for taxing the low-salaried people, the teachers of the country if you please, the most underpaid class of people that we have on the public pay roll, those who render the greatest service of any public servants.

I said "It seems to me that we went gunning for a mouse when elephants were at large." Between $50,000,000,000,000 and $60,000,000,000 worth of tax-exempt securities were going without a single dime being imposed by way of taxation.

As I understand it, one of the Rockefellers died and left an estate of something like $53,000,000, and $48,000,000 of it, I have been informed, was invested in tax-exempt securities upon which not a single dime of tax was imposed. I have introduced a bill in the House to provide for taxing the income and profits from all securities, Federal, State, county, and municipal, which bill has been referred to the Ways and Means Committee. I have asked for a hearing upon the same.

It is possible under our present system for a man to have an income of three or four or five million dollars a year and not even pay for police protection, court protection, court service, or schols for his children.

If the Townsend bill is passed it will put into circulation money which is lying static and dead in the banks of this country amounting to the staggering sum, if you please, of more than $9,000,000,000.

In addition, what else do you have? You have $52,000,000,000 on deposit in the banks. And I want to call your attention to this, Mr. Chairman, the reserve is never moved. It is an all-time high reserve in the history of this country. Now, cannot we find some way to help?

A gross-revenue or gross-receipts tax will provide sufficient revenue to meet the expediency of the program. A maximum monthly annuity of $200 may appear to be too high to many Members of Congress, but we must never forget our debt and our duty to the aged persons of our Nation. That debt, and duty as well, cannot be reckoned on monetary values, and whatever they receive will be a small portion of what they deserve.

From earliest civilization we have had the "haves" and the "have nots." Under our economic system the two classes are positive, normal products. We cannot melt the "haves" with the "have nots." Consequently, it is the duty of our economic system to provide for the "have nots" when they reach the autumn of their lives.

H. R. 6466 provides for the administration and related duties necessary for the carrying out of the Townsend program. It represents the best efforts of persons who have devoted many hours of labor and thought to the social-security cause.

We have tried hundreds of economic schemes to solve our internal problems. Surely we must not stop until we can at least find what program comes nearest to meeting the needs of our people—our youth, as well as the aged.

Ex-President Hoover wracked his brain from 1929 to 1932 to solve these problems to take off from the streets and off from the railroads the 12,000,000 to 14,000,000 men who were out of employment, living scarcely as human beings. I have seen thousands of people come into my town, which is a railroad city, crawling out of the freight cars, if you please, going down to the brush along the Yellowstone River and in the night coming up to town to get food, obtaining the trash from the stores that could not be used for sale purposes. I have seen good men and women living that way in my home city. President Roosevelt has taken his course in an attempt to solve this problem since 1933, but we still fall far short of our objective, and we still have millions and millions of unemployed in this country today who are hungry. Bear this fact in mind, Members of the Committee: That in your banks today you have over $9,000,000,000 that is static; that is held as a reserve. You also have hundreds of millions of dollars that are hoarded by the people.

The sccial-security program as it exists today is insufficient to meet the needs of the aged persons. An aged person cannot possibly live on $20 to $25 a month. I ask this question: What would one of us do if we were required to live upon the pittance that many of our elderly people in the United States are required to live upon now?

Now. Members of this Committee, is there a man on this Committee, or is there a Member of Congress, that would dare to get up in front of this body and who would admit to the elderly people of this country the fact that he would not pay the gross revenue tax if that would permit the aged to live in reasonable comfort? Whenever you give some money to somebody to spend, he is going to buy something with it, and you are going to put somebody to work to replace the article that he purchased. In my opinion, there is no such a thing as a waste of money. If I went out here on the street and threw a $20 bill away-which, of course, I would not, because I have not got it—but if I did that and somebody came along and picked it up and went uptown and bought a suit of clothes with it, or some lady bought a dress with it, that transaction is putting money into circulation. You have put to work somebody to make the article that he or she bought. It will stimulate industry.

It will be performing a duty that we owe to the aged people of the country, and, in addition to that, my friends, it will supplant the aged man with the youth who is traveling the country today without employment, out of a job, and, as I said a while ago, because of circumstances over which he has no control, we are making him a criminal. His average age in the penitentiary today is 21 years; we are hanging him; we are electrocuting him. Why? Because he has nothing What hope is there for a boy that graduates from school if he cannot find employment?

We talk about elections, electing a Republican or Democratic candidate in 1940 for President. I say to you if we do not solve our unemployment problem, then we have today in the White House the most conservative President this country will ever see. His successor will take the reins in his hand and use the resources of America to meet the needs of his people.

There are certain things that I hope the committee will not lose sight of in considering this bill, one of which is that this Nation is accredited with having or owning 60 percent of the resources of the world, and only 7 percent of the population of the world is in the United States.

The proponents and followers of this program, designed for economic recovery and social security, have been termed "crackpots" from many sides. This program deserves the utmost consideration by this body, and in fairness to thousands of my constituents I want to see this program in application. I can say this to the Members of the Committee: I think we have 20,000 members of the Townsend organizations in the eastern district of Montana alone. We may have to rely sometimes upon what some think today is a crackpot theory to lead us out of our present difficulty.

During the last few years we have applied to practical tests the best programs framed by the leading economic intellects of our country. Today, as I view the situation, we have made no more than a faint step toward our desired

I need not recite in detail the ironic story of machines replacing manpower. I need not dwell to any extent on the tremendous unemployment problem in the United States today. The facts are known by each Member of the Committee, by every Member of this Congress. You will recall that when the tractor replaced the horse in our agricultural regions several years ago, the mechanized tractor chugged onto the field and the horse was retired, not to green pastures but to the public lots. After creating nuisances, the horses were finally rounded up, shipped to various points over our Nation, and slaughtered and canned. Gentlemen, we cannot do that with the idle people who have been displaced by machinery.

Who will deny that the aged persons of our Nation must be taken out of industry to make room for the millions of unemployed roving youths in our country? And, also, who will deny that when aged persons are taken from the employment scene they must be given sufficient funds not only to meet their necessities but to provide comforts as well in their old age?

The Federal Bureau of Investigation recently informed me that the average age of criminals in our Nation today is 21 years. Now, think of that. Gentlemen of the Committee, I was informed by the Department of Justice also that the average cost of crime per annum to the Federal Government, the States, counties, and municipalities amounts to the staggering sum of $15,000,000,000. Now, that is a problem we have to consider. These young men and women have exhausted their patience seeking employment. They are met with the same answers each time they seek a job. If they cannot find work, they will find themselves in crime. Leisure is the devil's workshop for the youth of our Nation. And if we must have an unemployed class, it will be considerably better to have an unemployed class composed of the aged persons. Who is safer to be at large, hungry, with no place to go, a man in his teens or his early twenties, or a man 60 years of age or over? Who is safer to have at large and who will go farthest to get the necessities of life?

I receive scores of communications daily from my constituents in the eastern district of Montana urging my support in behalf of the passage of the Townsend national recovery program.

It is our duty as elected representatives of the people of our various districts to represent our constituents in the most efficient manner possible. When I impress upon you my stand in behalf of the Townsend program I am carrying out the desires of thousands of my Montana constituents who are not the type to fall in line behind a program built on a crackpot foundation.

You may recall reading of the time when Mr. Bell went to somebody to get him to help him finance the Bell Telephone Co., and when the poor fellow left, after having offered to sell a half interest in it for $500, the man that he offered it to did that-tapping his head-as though the man was crazy. Now, after all our great economists have tried it—the very greatest we have—we might have to try something else that does not perhaps ring 100 percent true to

We must bear in mind that the Townsend national recovery program is a recovery move as well as a social measure. The annuities will increase the purchasing power of a class of persons who today are barely earning sufficient funds to provide absolute necessities. I know of old people in my State of Montana that are living on from $12 to $15 or $20 a month. Are we performing our duties as Congressmen to that class of people, who have built our churches, our railroads, and our schoolhouses? Cannot they, and should not they, expect more of us? Furthermore, in addition to creating a new level of purchasing power, the program would provide jobs for our crime-bent youth, which consequently would open a new field of purchasers. When these people spend money industry is stimulated. Industrial wheels will not stand still when there is purchasing power to back the demand for the products. Furthermore, additional employment will be a necessity to provide articles desired by the new class of purchasers. New markets will appear on our economic skyline and demands supported by the necessary purchasing power for articles ranging from automobiles to fishing tackle will increase to an inestimable end.

Now, it is estimated that approximately 10,465,000 persons over 60 years of age would be eligible for pensions under the Townsend national recovery program, based on 1935 figures of the Census Bureau.

The Townsend program, as incorporated in the bill introduced by Representative Hendricks, provides for an efficient, workable social-security structure coupled with a sound recovery program. It was designed by some of the best minds of our country. Every person 60 years of age and over, who has been a full citizen of the United States for at least 5 years, is entitled to a monthly annuity under the Townsend program. It provides that the annuitant shall not engage in any gainful pursuit, thereby making room in unemployment ranks for youth who today are turning to crime in a pitiful attempt to solve their economic plight.

Members of the Committee, if it did not do anything else than put to work the youth of the country, if it did not increase employment at all, you would be doing a great service to our Nation in putting to work the youth and taking them off the streets, out of the pool halls, hell holes, and other places that are worse, putting them to work and giving them a chance to make a living like you and I had in our early life.

I read an article the other day written by Mrs. Roosevelt, the substance of which was this: What is the use in preparing to do something if you cannot find it to do after you are prepared? That is a very serious question. The obligations, Members of this Committee, are heavy upon your shoulders.

It has been argued that this bill does not produce anything that is not already in existence. In other words, that they have just as much to spend now as they would have after this bill were put into operation, because people are spending all they can get now. The reason I referred to the vast deposits and reserves was to show that we have an all time high of reserves in the banks today. If we had a stimulation of industry, and if we had the class of people buying something that has no buying power today, it would detract from this pile of money that is of no use to anybody. In other words, we would have more money in circulation; we would have more business, and therefore more transactions taking place. That is the point I make, because it is argued that this bill would not cause anything to be produced. It would cause an increase in the purchasing of goods, which would cause, in turn, an increase in employment. If we can only get into circulation what we already have and give buying power to that part of the public which has no buying power at the present time it will stimulate business and industry. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman and fellow Members of the Committee, I have followed with considerable interest and with some amazement the speeches which have been made this afternoon for H. R. 6466, the Townsend plan bill. A number of you gentlemen have spoken in opposition to the bill and at the same time have indicated your desire to be of assistance to the old people of our country and to provide for them adequate pension. It is quite singular that some who have made these statements have not been identified, so far as I know, with any particular move for particular relief for pension to the aged. If you are so earnest in your desire to provide pensions for the aged, why not have you already brought out and petitioned for a vote for an adequate plan for the aged? The Townsend plan is the best plan which has been offered and I urge each of you to support it.

Many have viewed with alarm the consequences of the Townsend plan bill. Do you not believe that the Congress would be able to amend the law if it proved not wise? I am firm in my conviction that if the Townsend plan bill or any other pension bill for the aged should be enacted and later found not adequate or not workable, then future Congresses could amend or change it.

Our Nation is the richest and most powerful of all nations. We have almost half of the wealth of the world and the American people are the largest consumers of manufactured products and of raw materials. Per family we consume and use more than any nation in the world. The fact of the matter is, in practically all of the comforts and luxuries of life, the American people, although embracing only about 6 percent of the world's population, consume as much as half. We possess about 3 percent of the world's area and about 6 percent of the population. We possess more than 40 percent of the wealth and produce practically all of many of the essentials of life. Our Nation is a large producer of practically all of the food necessities and of clothing necessities. Our mineral wealth and other natural wealth exceeds that of other nations.

In this land of wealth and plenty, we still have poverty and dire necessity for the things of life. A large percentage of our population, probably 30 percent, is not possessed adequately of the comforts and luxuries of life. The enactment of the bill before us will, I believe, bring to these and to all of our people a large degree of the luxuries of life, together with all of the necessities and many of the comforts. The tax burden as outlined in the bill will not fall hard on anyone. After its passage, employment will surmount unemployment because the recovery which it will bring will offer employment to the middle-aged and the youth of our land. Idle hands are the devil's instruments and idle brains are his workshop. Idleness is conducive to crime and discontent. With gainful employment, the youth of our land and the middle-aged will be led away from crime and, in fact, crime in our country will decrease.

Records show that many of the crimes in our country are committed by those who are idle. With the vast wealth and development possibilities in our country, there is no good reason for idleness and want. I believe that with the passage of this bill employment can be had for all of those who are actually desirous of working. I believe also that destitution will be replaced by prosperity.

Some of my colleagues have named this bill as class legislation. The Congress has from time to time enacted laws which were particularly beneficial to the wealthy and rich and the industrialists of our Nation. If this legislation is called class legislation for poor people, then has it not the same right of passage as class legislation for the wealthy people?

The machine age in which we are living must be met. Machines have multiplied the quantity of goods and also multiplied the number of unemployed. One machine now will do the services which formerly were done by from 20 to 200 men. Science and invention have also added to the unemployment list. It would not be practical to undertake to outlaw scientific development, research, and invention perfection. Rather than do this, it is the American ideal to place a premium upon the perfected devices and evolution of industrial and natural production. To meet this great progress and development in production, we must increase the purchasing power of the rank and file of the American people. With added purchasing power, added consumption will follow. In America it is not a question of overproduction as much as it is a problem of underconsumption and a lack of purchasing power. By the passage of this bill the purchasing power of the American people will be tremendously increased. This purchasing power will take manufactured articles as well as raw materials and these will be consumed. As these articles are consumed through the added purchasing power, then there is an added demand for raw material and for manufactured goods. With this added purchasing power and added demand for goods comes the necessity for additional employment and hours of work. The enactment of this bill will go a long way toward solving our unemployment problem and the economic distress now experienced by the rank and file of our people.

I urge my colleagues to think of this legislation in a businesslike manner and from a business point of view as well as a humane point of view. It will give security and comfort to the aged of our land who have during their younger and earning years helped to accumulate the wealth of our Nation. These senior citizens have done their duty and their part toward the development of our industrial and economic life. They likewise have done their part in the developing and maintaining of our civic institutions and our general civilization. It is heartless for a rich government to deny these senior citizens comfort and security. They are entitled to it, and they shall have it. This particular plan will not only give this to them but will also carry the other necessary benefits to our American people who are less than 60 years of age.

I have just read a startling statement in the Washington Post of May 31. This statement says that in New York State the average monthly relief grant per case last January was reported as $38.16, while in Mississippi the amount per family is $2.91. A family of four in Atlanta, Ga., obtains only $6.70, and the average in New Mexico was $2.50 monthly. It is a travesty on justice for relief to be so maladministered. A person can be hungry in Georgia, Mississippi, or New Mexico to the same degree that he can be hungry in New York, Pennsylvania, or Michigan. Hunger, want, and necessity do not know any geographical bounds. It is unjust, unfair, and tragic for the relief administration to politically toy with hungry stomachs in our land. The same amount of relief benefit and the same relief wage should be paid alike in every place and to every white person in the United States. I decry and deplore such miscarriage of justice and misuse of public tax funds. I am assuming, of course, that this article appearing today is correct. I believe the enactment of the Townsend plan bill will soon make unnecessary Federal W. P. A. appropriations as well as many other Federal emergency appropriations.

My constituents, thousands of them, are deeply interested in this bill and believe it is the solution to our present economic and social ills. I have received thousands of telegrams, letters, and petitions urging passage of it. I shall read one just received from a neighbor of mine, and his wife. This neighbor is one of our prominent citizens and has in mind only the best interests of America and its future. The letter follows:

STARKE, FLA., May 30, 1939.

Hon. Lex Green, Congressman.

Dear Lex: This is to let you know that we are for the Townsend plan, H. R. 2. We expect to fight for it until we win. We sincerely hope that you are still with us, that you will make a fight for it when it comes to the floor, which we understand that will be Wednesday. The people as a whole in your district are depending on you—not only the Townsend members but the believers of the movement.

Respectfully,

W. A. COLLEY AND WIFE.

There are many other advantages which I would like to outline which this bill, when enacted, will bring to the American people, but time will not permit. I shall vote for the passage of the bill and commend its enactment to my colleagues.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. Lemke].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the pending bill, known as the Townsend bill, because I believe in an adequate old-age pension. We need not deceive ourselves by thinking we are going to escape our responsibility by setting up a man of straw and then proceeding to knock him over.

This bill provides a tax. This tax is the meat of the bill. It provides that the old people shall get the proceeds from that tax. I am informed that this will not exceed $50 or $60 a month.

It is a fraud and a deception to intimate that this bill provides for $200 a month. It does nothing of the kind. It provides that if the tax brings in enough the amount that any one individual may receive shall not exceed $200. The statements made here about $200 a month are not fair to the Members of Congress.

There are two things that should be borne in mind; that there is a deplorable financial condition existing throughout this Nation, not only of the old people, but of the young, and I feel that this legislation is a step in the right direction, that it will take from the industrial life about 6,000,000 people who ought to taken from it, because they are no longer capable and they have done their work in building this Nation, and it will give about 6,000,000 of the unemployed an opportunity to get employment.

So far as the merits of the bill are concerned, the young people are just as vitally interested in it as the old, because this is, in fact, and in truth, an insurance policy which cannot be forfeited or canceled for nonpayment of premiums.

The amount that each such individual will receive will depend entirely upon the income from the tax. There is one thing sure, it will be a great deal more than the few who are over 65 years of age now receive under the so-called old-age assistance. It will be given to all alike regardless of what State they live in.

Under the present law if you are 65 years of age and your State happens to be able to pay you $2 a month, then the Federal Government will add $2, making $4. Again, if your State is able to pay you $4 a month, then the Federal Government will add another $4, making $8. If your State pays you $15 a month, then the Federal Government will add another $15, making $30. But if you live in a State that does not or cannot pay you anything, then the Federal Government will also desert you. I feel that the Federal Government should treat all its citizens alike, no matter in what State they reside. If the State does not or cannot pay you anything, then you will need Federal aid all the more.

I agree that this bill will increase the cost of living, but not near as much as some of those theorists have told you. But that increase will be more than set off when we will be able to take six or seven million of the young unemployed and give them permanent work when the six or seven million old people retire from gainful employment under the provisions of this act. These young people will then be able to become self-supporting in place of living on a dole and a sandwich handed out to them by relief organizations.

It also will give security not only to the old but an assurance of security to the young. It will act as an insurance policy which cannot and will not be forfeited by non-payment of premiums. I am sure the average man and woman will be willing to pay a little more for the cost of living provided they are sure that when they reach the age of 60 they will be taken care of, not as a matter of charity but as a matter of right.

The money which the old people will receive under this bill is not wealth, but it is the purchasing power, the yard-stick with which they can measure and consume the wealth of which we have too much—the wealth which the Secretary of Agriculture had to destroy because, he says, we have too much of everything. This bill would provide a means for redistributing this wealth to the men and women who created it.

The Secretary of Agriculture recently plowed under 60,000 acres of sugarcane in the South. I want to give the old people the purchasing power—the yardstick—so that they can get some of that sugar. [Applause.]

Let us look at ourselves. Some of you have been here with me now for 7 years. We are still just where we started. We still have from twelve to thirteen million unemployed. We still have a situation where one farmer out of every five has lost his home by mortgage foreclosure.

Yet we are afraid to do anything for the people for fear we will make a mistake. May I say that if this Congress should make a mistake in trying to help the great mass of American people it will be the first time in the history of this Nation that Congress has made a mistake on the side of the people. Heretofore it has always made the mistake on the side of the selected few.

I cannot understand why some Members of Congress are so afraid that the people who have created the wealth of this Nation may get too much of it back. "Old-age pension should be called "old-age compensation," because any person who has worked at a useful occupation from the age of 20 to the age of 60 has produced enough wealth to take care of himself or herself for the rest of his or her life. If such a person finds himself or herself in financial distress and without the means of a comfortable livelihood, then it is because someone appropriated this wealth, or, rather, misappropriated it.

We have now arrived at a stage in our civilization where we realize that as a nation we can safely restore to the aged part of the wealth which they created, part of the wealth taken from them by overzealous individuals and corporations. This is not a pension; it is not charity; it is a compensation for useful labor performed or for wealth actually created or produced.

In fact, the Federal Government, as well as the States, require a pauper's oath from the aged in order to give them just a dribbling of that which is theirs, which they are entitled to, and which they themselves have created or produced, but which under our financial system has been taken from them, generally without their consent and without fault on their part.

In the distant past, as well as more recently, the combined energies of the world were required to produce the necessities of life. Nations became great because of an abundance of raw materials and sufficient labor to change these raw materials into finished products, but even then there was usually a scarcity of some of the necessities. Saving and thrift became the watchword of the day.

Now, however, owing to machines, to mechanical inventions, and chemical discoveries, all this has been changed. We suddenly find that we have an abundance for all. Our problem no longer is how to produce more nor fear the morrow may not bring plenty, but, rather, how to distribute the things that we have and that are essential to our well-being

In place of destroying this food and clothing and other essentials of life, why not distribute it to those who helped to create it and need it? Why does Congress not pass a decent and intelligent old-age pension bill? Such a bill would provide the machinery for the distribution of our so-called surplus and overproduction. It would compensate the aged for part of the wealth they have created. Such a bill would make it unnecessary for the aged to continue in industrial competition with the youth of this Nation. It would to a large extent solve our unemployment problem. It would give to those who have toiled for 40 years a needed and deserved rest for the remainder of their lives. It would add to the health and well-being of the Nation. It would give peace and contentment where now all is doubt, uncertainty, insecurity, and mental suffering.

We all know that this Nation is still in agony. We all know that we still have some 15,000,000 on a disguised dole; that every courthouse is a poorhouse. We all know, in spite of all the statements to the contrary by politicians for political reasons, that mortgage foreclosures on city and farm homes are continuing and that thousands are being evicted from their homes. I regret to say that official Washington does not know what is going on in this Nation. It seems deaf and blind to the appeals of the men and women who have made this Nation what it is.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. JENKS].

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I rise to voice my approval of the passage of H. R. 6466. I believe that the enactment of this legislation would be a step in the right direction (1) because it would establish a pension system for persons over 60 years of age which would afford them for the present the basic necessities of life and as time goes on, I hope, the comforts they should have, (2) because it would be at least a partial solution of the unemployment problem with which the country has been so sorely harassed for the past several years, and (3) because it would increase the confidence and contribute to the improvement of the morale of the old and young alike.

It is estimated that some 8,000,000 of our citizens who have passed the noonday of life would avail themselves of this annuity. We have in the neighborhood of 10,000,000 unemployed persons. During the course of the past 6 years, our national debt has been increased by some $20,000,-000,000 in an effort to solve this unemployment problem, which is the root of our economic difficulties. Despite the vast pump-priming efforts that have been made at such a tremendous cost, the unemployment problem remains unsolved while the national debt steadily mounts with no prospect of surcease. The rapid strides that have been made in industrial mechanical equipment and scientific management have brought about a displacement of labor and the ensuing struggle for a livelihood, with which we are all familiar; machines now do the work which formerly kept many hands busy and that are now doomed to idleness.

It seems to me that a logical attack on this most stubborn and obstinate problem of unemployment would be to remove from the industrial market this percentage of persons over 60 years of age by awarding them, on a pay-as-we-go basis, adequate old-age annuities which would retain them as a force in the purchasing power of the country.

I regard this bill (H. R. 6466) which we have before us only as a beginning. I realize that the estimated pension of $50 per month carried in the measure we have under consideration will prove a great disappointment to many people who have hoped and who have thought in terms of a larger amount. Those people, however, will realize that all legislation is largely a matter of negotiation and compromise, and that any law that proves itself to be practicable, workable, and beneficial can be amended from time to time with a view to expanding its scope and broadening its terms. To those who suffer disappointment over the revision that has been made in the tax section of the bill, let me say that half a loaf is better than none. Let me further say that if this bill is enacted into law definite progress will have been made toward the desired goal because it would establish a pension system for all citizens over 60 years of age from which the stigma of pauperism will have been removed in that it would not require that an individual be practically a candidate for the almshouse before he or she would be eligible to apply for benefits, which is largely what we have under the present Social Security Act.

I am supporting this bill not because I believe that in its initial operations it would provide an adequate old-age annuity to its beneficiaries but because I believe it would establish the proper principle and the correct basis on which old-age annuities should be awarded.

In supporting this bill and advocating its passage, I am redeeming my pledge to cooperate in every manner possible toward the enactment of liberalized old-age pension legislation. Despite its imperfections, this bill (H. R. 6466) is seemingly the best we can get at this time and it probably constitutes our only opportunity to accomplish definite action in the matter of liberalized old-age pension legislation. For that reason I shall vote for it and I urge the Members of this body to do likewise. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMITH] as he desires.

Mr. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Chairman, 25 years ago I introduced in the Maine Legislature the first old-age pension bill presented in that section of the country. Since that day I have patiently striven for, and waited the time when our older people could, through such a medium, be happy and comfortable during their declining years.

In those days a pension for the aged was regarded as a fantastic idea, and many pointed me out as being a dangerous man to society. But such epithets inspired me with courage and a desire to fight onward for the cause. And strange as it may seem, such activities have not interfered with my 49 elections without defeat.

When a candidate for the Seventy-fifth Congress my opponent in the primaries was a Townsend advocate, and after being defeated he, through Democratic influence and Townsend approval, became an independent Republican candidate in the following election. It is needless to say that this dramatic effort to retain the Second District in the Democratic column failed.

However, I became interested in the Townsend plan and its transaction tax, and sponsored it in the succeeding successful election, completely proving that one could win while sponsoring a pension program even at a time when the political pendulum was swinging the other way.

Since the last election throughout the Nation was more or less contingent on the Townsend plan, millions of proponents throughout the country had a right to expect action.

Instead, day by day, they have been sadly disappointed. It is beyond conception why so much time has been wasted, and after waiting nearly 5 months some of us wired Townsend headquarters urging at least cooperation.

One group has been contending that the negligence was of a political nature, that there were those who were hoping to drag this issue into another campaign. Others figured that such unfair tactics afforded profiteers a chance to collect nickels.

More amazing still is the fact that, so far as can be determined, not a single effort has been made to ascertain how many would be eligible and the amount of money pensioners would receive from the Townsend plan-a most ridiculous situation.

It was for this reason that I refused to go before the Committee on Ways and Means, unwilling to take part where Townsend sponsors were guessing at this amount, varying from fifty to one hundred and fifty dollars per month, or eight to twenty-four billions of dollars per year. Members of the Ways and Means Committee should not be condemned for not making recommendations when confronted with such indefinite information.

In order to do my bit to help out this homely situation. I was determined to ascertain the number of persons included and amount of money involved in the transactions tax, first by selecting a town of 6,400 people as a basis, one typical of municipalities throughout the country, one with a mixture of races and varying industries. This arduous task consisted of many tests and unlimited compilations, taking months of time.

Results, so far as is humanly possible to obtain, disclose that there are 8,320,026 persons 60 and more years old who would apply for a pension; that the amount available would be $7,089,662,060, and would provide a pension of $70 per month, or $852 per year, less administrative expense.

Less than 3 months ago these facts and figures were placed with Townsend sponsors who appeared to be interested and admitted that something of this kind should have been done long ago.

However, new legislation has been offered by way of H. R. 6466 with the revenue program definitely changed. The transaction tax, for 2 years heralded by Dr. Townsend as being perfect, goes out of the window.

Such methods not only mean postponement of this bill but create perplexities and misunderstandings by supporters.

Furthermore, until one of its sponsors can show the difference in revenue between old and new bills, some of us believe the amount of pension, set up in latest Townsend plan, has been materially reduced.

I fear the vote about to be taken will reveal that Members in Congress are tired and sick of going one way today and in another direction tomorrow.

Suggestions that may be opportune:

First. Members in Congress, any of us, who use the Townsend badge to pull off publicity stunts or create political capital are not immune from criticism. Old-age pensions transcend personal and political interest.

Second. Dr. Townsend would do well to wear his own hat, listen less to others, and think for himself. Too many politicians, like too many cooks, spoil the broth. Older people of this Nation want one leader, Dr. Townsend.

Third. If you and I do not prevent further delays and confusion of the Townsend plan, we are not true to ourselves or to each other. Too many brothers and sisters, fathers and mothers, are making the last turn in life's journey while waiting and watching.

Dr. Townsend has done more than any man or group of men to create a pension-minded public, and our people, old and young, owe him an eternal debt of gratitude for conceiving a plan that will not only alleviate sufferings of those fading years but likewise protect the younger who, too, find themselves without a chance to earn a living.

Regardless of what mistakes have been made, regardless of who is accountable for the many delays, regardless of who is responsible for changes, we must go forward united, determined that man's inalienable rights shall, first of all, be enjoyed by those who have either fought or endured for freedom's cause.

Let me say that you who are more conservative—yes, perhaps more sensible—would, in my opinion, be among the first to extend the milk of human kindness if brought face to face with the condition that confronts more than 20,000,000 men and women of this day and generation.

This thought brings to our minds that the President of the United States is deserving of untold plaudits for making old-age assistance a national reality.

Sometimes I ask brighter men than myself to offer one good reason why the Townsend plan should not be adopted. Usually replies consist of misunderstanding of facts, many believing that a $200 pension is the goal.

Others will tell you that the amount of money involved will destroy our monetary system, that such an appropriation is insane and impossible. They forget that the required $8,000,000,000, on a pay-as-you-go basis, is about one-third of what has already been borrowed during the past few years.

Opponents cannot visualize that the Townsend money will relieve State and National Budgets of billions of dollars now being expended for relief and old-age assistance.

At times they overlook the fact that this plan will absorb much unemployment, and as proof of this theory, I call attention to the other side of the House where it is believed that one, two, or three billions of dollars, invested in W. P. A., cause business to improve and unemployment to recede.

By this same token, we claim that by increasing three or four times this buying power, and distributing it free from graft and politics in every community, month by month throughout the year, we will not only bring a temporary but lasting prosperity without increasing debts and taxes.

My friends, our older people were once the lifeblood of this country, caring for themselves and preserving the comforts of home for their kind and kin.

Today these pioneers are helpless because of conditions beyond their control. Surely these men are not to blame for property depreciations, closing of banks, higher living costs, loss of opportunity to earn a living.

Our present pension system is unjust, inadequate, and insufficient to fittingly care for fathers and mothers, to create a purchasing power that the younger and the stronger may take their places in the channels of progress and development.

If we do not act in this grave emergency, if we do not listen to the quivering lips of emaciated men and women, we will not fight a good fight, we will not run the course, we will not keep the faith.

Remember, if this bill is defeated, it is not dead, for like all other great reforms, it is just beginning. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. Morr].

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, it is regrettable, to say the least, that the House of Representatives must consider a bill of this importance under a gag rule permitting only 4 hours of debate. When I say "a bill of this importance" I mean exactly that. No bill has been introduced in Congress in the past 5 years which has attracted more attention throughout the country or which has been given more careful study by the great masses of our people than this bill. No bill during that time has received more popular support than this one, and there is no legislative proposal before the Congress now which has behind it a greater or a more serious demand than this one for fair, honest, and unprejudiced consideration at the present time.

But after 5 years of earnest and thoughtful discussion and consideration of legislation along this line, not only by Members of Congress here on this floor, but by millions of their constituents in every State and every congressional district in the Nation, what do we find? We find that most of the opposition here to the present bill (H. R. 6466), which is the legislative form in which the principles of the Townsend plan for a Federal old-age pension law are presented to us, has been solely in the nature of ridicule.

Thus far in the debate, with perhaps one or two exceptions, no serious well-considered argument has been advanced against this bill by any of its opponents. My opinion is that they do not intend during the remainder of the debate to offer serious argument or any facts whatever. They are still content, as they always have been, to laugh at this proposal and to ridicule it, notwithstanding the fact that most of them have never given 5 minutes' actual study to the bill and have not the slightest idea either of its specific provisions or of the fundamental principles on which it is based.

Now, I tell my colleagues sericusly, if they do not already know it, that they cannot ridicule this thing out of existence and they cannot laugh it out of existence. You cannot ridicule or laugh out of existence a proposal which has behind it the affirmative support of more than 30,000,000 citizens of this country. You may think you can do so, and perhaps for the moment you can. But it is my humble opinion and prediction that the time will come, and that shortly, when your answer to the demand of the aged and the poor for a decent and sensible old-age pension will have to be something more substantial and affirmative than ridicule.

I have time in this debate only to scratch the surface, and I want to say first of all that there is no essential difference between the bill that is now before us and the bill H. R. 2, for which this is a substitute. There is a technical difference in the method of taxation, but that is all the difference there is. The tax proposed in both bills is a transaction tax. In H. R. 2 it was a straight transaction tax, or, as some have called it, a multiple sales tax. In H. R. 6466 the tax is still a tax upon transactions, but the tax is for the most part measured by the volume of the gross revenue of those who are subject to the tax. It simplifies the transaction tax by eliminating the multiplicity of the taxable transactions. In this respect it is an improvement on H. R. 2. In all other respects the two bills are almost identical.

Now, what is the principal object and purpose behind all this so-called Townsend legislation? Let me say in the beginning, for the benefit of those who may be confused or bewildered by the deliberately planned tactics of opponents who are undertaking in this debate to kill the bill by laughing at it, that there is nothing mysterious or ambiguous, or even very unusual about it. And I may add, also, for the benefit of some of those who have been miscast in the role of comedians in this debate, that there is nothing funny about it, either.

The fundamental principle and the object of the bill is simply this—to provide an opportunity for every person in the United States who has reached the age limit of his real economic usefulness to retire completely from competition with those who have not reached that age, upon a Federal pension sufficient in amount to permit him to do this, and to live the remainder of his life in decency and comfort and happiness. And this legislation proposes further that this great blessing of security shall be extended to the aged of our Nation, not as a charity but as a matter of right.

Now, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that no intelligent Member of this body can logically find fault with that proposition, which is the very basis and the whole basis upon which the Townsend proposal rests. And I assert further that to ridicule it and to laugh at it shows a most amazing lack of intelligence on the part of the one who does so. And I say still further that any Member who cannot accept that basic proposition as a desirable goal to be attained is entirely out of line and out of touch with the almost universal thought and opinion of the people of this country.

But in spite of the fact that every informed person knows that the object and purpose of this bill is precisely what I just stated it to be, opponent after opponent has taken the floor in this debate and has declared that the millions of people throughout the country who are supporting the Townsend legislation do not know what it is all about. They assert that these people have been fooled into believing that this proposal is something which it is not. They contend, for example, that these people believe the bill before us provides for a pension of $200 per month and that they believe they are going to get that pension if the bill becomes law. And then these opponents, having thus set up a straw man of their own making, have proceeded to knock the straw man down and to ridicule what they call the absurdity of the situation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, all I care to say in reply to that kind of argument is this: Opponents who have made this claim here on the floor of the House are more familiar with their own districts and with the people whom they represent in Congress than I am. I am willing to admit that in some of those congressional districts the average intelligence of the people is not very high. I am willing to admit that in some States and in some congressional districts there may be supporters of this bill who are as ignorant of its plain provisions as their own Representatives in Congress have here declared them to be. But I say emphatically that that is not true of the supporters of this bill in States and congressional districts having populations of average intelligence, and I here declare categorically and of my own knowledge that it is not true of the supporters of this bill in the State and district which I have the honor to represent in the Congress of the United States. The people of Oregon know exactly what this legislation is. Nobody has fooled them. Nobody can fool them. A substantial majority of the people of my State favor this legislation. A substantial minority are opposed to it. But both sides know what the legislation is, and both its support and its opposition is intelligent. I make bold to suggest, therefore, to gentlemen who, in this debate, have charged that the people who are supporting this bill are ignorant of its provisions, that they confine their observations in this regard to their own constituents, who are the only people whose intelligence or lack of intelligence they know anything about. They can answer to them for impugning the intelligence of their own people if they want to. That is their business. But when they go further than that and undertake to insult the intelligence of people in another part of the country, about whom they are totally ignorant, then their gratuitous observations can be taken as nothing more nor less than just plain, ordinary impertinence.

Now, I have said that the object and purpose of this bill is to provide a pension sufficient in amount to enable those who have reached the age limit of their economic usefulness to retire from competition with those who have not reached that age, and I have said that in the opinion of the overwhelming majority of our people in all walks of life that that object and purpose is a desirable one—a thing which ought to be accomplished if we can devise legislation which will accomplish it. The only question in consideration of this bill, therefore, which can be properly raised is this: Does the bill now before us, H. R. 6466, offer a feasible, a sound, and a practical method of achieving this admittedly worthy object? Let us examine it solely with this question in mind, and not in a spirit of prejudice and vituperation, and see whether reason and experience, when applied to the provisions of the bill, will not answer the question for us.

The bill places the age of eligibility for a pension at 60 years. Why? For two reasons: First, because experience has shown that in modern industry-and in that term I include industry and business of every kind-the limit of the average person's real economic usefulness is reached, and that the majority of people above that age have not been able to exist in competition with people who have not reached that age. The second reason is that 9 people out of 10 above the age of 60 years do not have an income sufficient to support themselves and that the majority of people of that age are objects of charity in one form or another. Ninety percent of all the people past 60 who are holding jobs at the present time are holding them at the expense of younger people who are better fitted to do the work, and they are thus keeping out of employment millions of people who are still within the age which qualifies them to do the work required by modern Looking at the problem, therefore, from the viewpoint of economic necessity and desirability alone, I think most people will agree that the age of 60 is a proper age of eligibility under any comprehensive Federal old-age pension law. From the humanitarian angle, also, an age limit not greater than this commends itself to most students of this problem.

No one, of course, is obliged to accept a pension under this bill. If he does accept it, however, he must agree to spend it and not hoard it, and he must also agree to retire from active competition with those who have not reached the eligible age. There are two reasons for this provision. The first is that since the pensioner is to be assured of an adequate annuity monthly during the remainder of his life, and that remaining period is a brief one, there is no economic necessity for his having to save it; and the second reason is that it is economically desirable to put this huge pension fund into continuous general circulation. That the circulation of this fund obviously will tend to increase business, to create new jobs, and to otherwise help to bring about a recovery, there can be little doubt.

This bill is unique among the many old-age pension proposals in that it provides a definite method for raising the necessary revenue to finance the pensions. It does not depend upon borrowing to finance it, as does so much of the so-called recovery and reform legislation enacted by Congress during the present administration. Neither does it depend for its financing upon taking out of the Treasury a part of the money raised for general governmental purposes. Finally, it does not propose to increase existing rates on any of the taxes which are now employed by the Federal Government for revenue-raising purposes. The bill proposes a new kind of tax, which is to be used exclusively for the financing of the pensions to be paid under it, and for no other purpose.

The bill (H. R. 6466) provides for the raising of the revenue necessary to pay the pensions by imposing and collecting each month the following taxes: (1) a tax of one-half of 1 percent on the sales of all producers selling any commodity as a producer; (2) a tax of one-half of 1 percent on the sales of all manufacturers selling any commodity as a manufacturer, (3) a tax of one-half of 1 percent on the sales of wholesalers or jobbers doing business as such, and (4) a tax of 2 percent on the gross proceeds of sales, or the gross revenue, of all others not included in the first three classifications.

Now that is a very simple but accurate statement of the whole tax feature of the bill. Wages and salaries, as such, are not taxed under this bill, nor is any other personal revenue received by a person in the pursuit of his trade, occupation, or calling, whatever it may be. The reason for this is that it is this personal revenue from which, ultimately, all taxes of every kind are paid, including the taxes specifically named in this bill. This revenue is the revenue of the ultimate consumer, to whom every tax now in existence is passed on. The ultimate consumer always pays all the taxes and no system has ever been devised under which he can escape this tax burden. To levy a separate tax directly on the ultimate consumer, therefore, would serve only to tax him again after all the other taxes provided in the bill had been already passed on to him.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you may be in favor of the taxes I have just outlined, and which include all of the taxes provided in this bill, or you may be opposed to them. But I submit, in all sincerity, that the claims made here on the floor of the House that these taxes would bankrupt the Government and ruin the business of the country are absurd on their face, and that there are no facts whatever to support such a claim. By what process of mathematical calculation, for example, is it claimed that a manufacturers' sales tax of one-half of 1 percent would ruin a manufacturer? The slightest increase in his cost of labor, or the difference in his cost of material from time to time, amounts to far more than that and has a greater effect on the cost of his manufactured article than this small tax could possibly

Not one shred of evidence has been produced in this debate or in the hearings on the bill tending to show that such a tax would be even burdensome, let alone ruinous, to the manufacturer. And the same thing is true of each and every one of the other taxes provided in this bill. And let me say further that all the taxes in the bill combined do not amount to a fraction of the Federal sales or excise taxes which many of these manufacturers are already paying under existing law. The present manufacturers' sales tax on cigarettes, for example, is 200 percent-not one-half of 1 percent, but 200 percent, or just 400 times as large as the tax provided in this bill-yet will anyone say that even this huge present cigarette tax has bankrupted the cigarette manufacturer? Of course it has not, and if an additional tax of one-half of 1 percent were collected from the cigarette manufacturers that would not bankrupt him either. Hundreds of other examples could be cited, but everyone is familiar with them, and everybody who has given any study whatever to the subject knows that a reasonable manufacturers' sales tax has never hurt any manufacturer. He simply passes the taxes on, as all other taxes always are passed on, to you and to me, and to all of the other 130,-000,000 ultimate consumers of this country.

Some question has been raised as to the amount of revenue which the taxes specified in this bill would provide. It has been contended that we do not know just how much that revenue will amount to, and that therefore we cannot calculate what the amount of the pension will be. I am perfectly willing to admit that, but I do not admit that that is a valid objection to the bill. No one can tell in advance of the actual levy and collection of a new tax just how much that tax will raise. This has been true of every new tax bill. It was largely for that very reason that this bill does not undertake to prescribe the amount of the monthly pension to be paid under it. The bill simply provides that out of the revenue raised by these taxes the pensions shall be paid, pro rata monthly, to those eligible to receive them under the bill.

And now, in this connection, I want to make an important observation. It is this: There has been entirely too much controversy as to the probable amount of the pension to be paid under this bill. The amount of the pension to be paid during the first year or two of the operation of this law, if the bill becomes law, is not, in my opinion, very important at this time. The important thing is not to get a law which will immediately pay a fixed pension large enough to satisfy everybody. The important thing here and now is to get the fundamental principle of this bill enacted into law and to set up the tax machinery to finance it. That fundamental principle, as I have so often repeated, is to provide a pension for everyone who has reached the age where he ought to retire, in an amount sufficient to enable him to retire in complete comfort and in peace of mind, so that he may be freed entirely from the necessity of competition and so that he may safely turn over the job he now holds to a younger man who is out of a job and who is being kept out of that job largely because it is necessary for the old worker to hold on to it as long as he can in order to live. We know this bill will do that, even if we are not able in advance to calculate in dollars and cents the exact amount of the pension.

This security, this assurance of an adequate means of support for all of our people when they become old, this, and not the precise amount of the pension, is the fundamental principle, the dominant idea behind this proposed legislation. And when we have enacted that proposal into statutory law we will have accomplished two great things which have never yet been accomplished in the whole history of the world. We will have changed the period of old age from a period of fear and want and despair into that period of happiness and blessedness which the Creator surely meant it to be. That is what this bill will do from the humanitarian angle of it. Upon its economic side it will take the greatest step toward the solution of our unemployment problem that has ever been taken, because it will necessarily release millions of jobs to the young people of our Nation who now, through no fault of their own, find themselves without work while they are still living in the period of their greatest economic usefulness.

Therefore, I want to say again that whether the bill will furnish an immediate pension as large as some have claimed or hoped for is not at all the important thing at this particular time. The important thing is that this pension, which will at least be an adequate one, will actually enable the old people of our country to cease competition and to retire; and this great purpose having once been actually accomplished by law, that law can be amended at any subsequent session of the Congress so as to fix the pension at whatever figure experience and good judgment may then show that the tax proposed in this bill can properly and safely provide.

I now wish to discuss briefly the reason why it is necessary to employ the transaction tax in one form or another in order to provide revenue enough to finance an adequate pension system. Objection has been advanced against the transaction taxes provided in H. R. 6466 on the ground that they are really multiple sales taxes, and that a sales tax is wrong in principle because it does not assess the taxpayer in accordance with his ability to pay. This is one of the few objections that have been offered seriously to the bill during the course of the present debate, and it is entitled to a serious answer.

I answer that objection, first, by admitting that for purposes of general revenue for ordinary governmental purposes the sales tax is not an equitable tax, because under it the poor man is more heavily burdened than the rich man. This is because the poor man must spend everything he makes in order to live, while the rich man needs to spend only a portion of his income for that purpose. But I contend that this objection is valid only when the sales tax is used for the general revenue-raising purposes. When it is used for a specific and exclusive purpose—for the purpose of financing a necessary and indispensable activity outside of the usual and ordinary functions of government—then this objection largely disappears, because then the tax is used for the direct and special benefit of those who pay it.

There are many examples of the truth of the statement I have just made. I will cite only one; that of the gasoline tax, which is purely and simply a sales tax. The sales tax on gasoline in most States amounts to from 20 to 25 percent of the retail price of the gasoline. No one would tolerate such a tax for general governmental purposes. But the gasoline tax is paid by motorists, for whose benefit the roads are built, and it is used exclusively for road building. Without the gasoline sales tax the motorist knows his automobile would be useless to him. Therefore he willingly pays the tax, which is several times as high as the tax contemplated in this bill, because he derives the entire benefit of the tax he pays. I venture to say that the most outspoken opponent of the general sales tax-and I myself happen to be one of them-would not for a moment consider doing away with the gasoline sales tax, or even reducing it in any considerable amount.

The same reason that makes the gasoline sales tax desirable and necessary for the special and exclusive purpose of road building makes such a tax as the transaction tax desirable and necessary for the financing of this new and special and necessary Government activity, which is for the direct and special benefit of those who pay the tax, and without which tax the benefit cannot be given.

The objection to the tax feature of this bill is a fundamental objection, of course, but I think a complete answer can be given to that objection by asking this question: Is the benefit to be derived by the taxpayer from this bill great enough and necessary enough to warrant the tax burden which it must necessarily impose upon the taxpayer? If it is, then the objection fails no matter what the objector may think of this particular tax, because without some special tax of this kind it would be impossible to raise enough revenue to finance any comprehensive adequate Federal old-age pension.

Therefore if it be once conceded that we should have an adequate Federal old-age pension system, and nearly everyone now does concede that, then we must provide for its financing; and to do that we must of necessity employ a tax which is capable of raising the necessary revenue. Since no other tax entirely capable of doing this has as yet been proposed, or appears likely to be proposed, it follows as a matter of ordinary logic that this is the tax which should be employed.

And who pays the tax under this bill? Obviously everybody pays it. Who directly benefits by paying the tax? Again everybody, because everybody living in the United States, no matter what his age, will be eligible to the benefits of the act, if he needs them, when he reaches the eligible age. And please do not forget in this connection that experience has already demonstrated that 90 percent of the American people now living will need its benefits when they arrive at that age. That is a plain, cold, statistical fact, which should give pause to everyone in his consideration of this bill.

It has been argued here that this bill is a tax on poverty. I do not agree with that, nor do I think such a contention can reasonably be sustained. It is a tax upon the rich and the poor alike. But to those who say that the poor will pay most of the tax because they constitute the great majority of our population, because they make up the major portion of the ultimate consumers, and because they must spend all they earn in order to live, I reply that it is the poor who will most surely be the direct beneficiaries of this bill. I reply also that it is not the poor who are objecting to the taxing features of the bill. And if the poor themselves do not object to being taxed for the purpose of insuring to themselves a little comfort and happiness when finally they enter upon the twilight of the evening of their lives, surely no one else should be heard to raise his voice against it.

I wish it were possible to find a tax which the very poor did not have to pay at all, but no one, I am sure, believes that this is possible. It is the poor who have always been really taxed, regardless of what the form of taxation has been. The great income-tax payers, for example, have always managed to pass along most of the tax to the consumer, although the tax the income-tax payer pays is merely a tax upon his profits. Even this tax he passes on to the ultimate consumer who, as has truly been said, is for the most part poor. Throughout all history that has been the The rich always have been few. Always the poor have been multitude. From the beginning the poor have carried upon their backs the burden of the world. They still carry it. They have fought its battles, they have created its wealth, they have paid its taxes, and as their reward they have died, as they have lived, still poor. I say this has always been so. But has not the time now come to inquire whether it must continue to be so forever? Is there always to be no hope, no reward, no surcease from the never-ending toil of the masses of our people?

Mr. Chairman, for the first time in the history of legislation I see in this bill the hope that the age-long burden of the poor may be lightened, at least toward the end of the journey. This bill does not propose to make the poor man rich. It does not propose, as has mockingly been said, to make spendthrifts of the aged. It does not propose to bring about any revolutionary change in our economic system. It does not propose to take away wealth from anyone. But it does propose, and it does undertake, to insure to all the people of the United States, no matter how poor they may be, that when they have reached that age in life where they are no longer fitted by nature to continue the strenuous fight for existence that they shall receive back something of the wealth they have already created as their reward and their due for having created it.

It does undertake to say to them that when, by virtue of their years, the time comes for retirement that they shall be entitled to retire as a matter of right and that their retirement shall be one of comfort and security. It undertakes to liberate from the minds of all the devastating fear of poverty in their declining years and to bless those years with the sunshine of peace and happiness. And while doing all this it undertakes at the same time a rational effort to solve at least a part of the vital problem of unemployment which must be solved if the Nation is to endure but which all the billions expended and all the volumes of legislation of the past 7 years have as yet failed to accomplish.

A measure having these things for its purpose and its goal must, in my opinion, ultimately become law. I believe the bill now before us, if enacted, will go far toward reaching that goal. I consider myself fortunate in having had the opportunity to support the first legislation of this kind—the revised McGroarty bill-upon its initial introduction in the Congress and to have had some part in the making of subsequent bills translating the fundamental principles of this basic pension plan into concrete legislative proposals. I am convinced the time is near at hand when the Congress must inevitably see the wisdom and necessity for enacting these proposals into law. The demand of the people of our country for a sensible, workable, and adequate Federal old-age pension system, such as this bill provides, is a demand which the Congress eventually must meet and which through enactment of legislation of this kind it can meet. This demand on the part of the people is a natural and a human one arising out of a basic necessity which has long since been admitted by everyone. It is a righteous and a just demand and it is growing more insistent and more emphatic every day. It cannot and it will not long remain unheeded by those who represent the people here in the lawmaking body of our Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck].

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire particularly to address myself this afternoon to those Members of the House who were not here with us in 1935. This Townsend plan is no new proposal. It was offered as an amendment to the original social-security bill in 1935, in a different form. Then it was the third of the eight different proposals which have been presented under the name of that gentleman to date. A fourth proposal was offered before the Social Security Act was adopted, and since that time we have had three other versions of the plan and finally the one which you are considering now. The bill that you have under consideration, H. R. 6466, was only introduced after the hearings on amendments to the Social Security Act or substitutes therefor had been closed by our committee, and long after Dr. Townsend had promised to present my amendments that he cared to have the committee consider in modification of H. R. 2 would be introduced. It is the eighth of the Townsend proposals.

While the spots on the leopard have been painted over a little bit it is still the same old leopard that is before us. I hope, therefore, that those of you who are interested in going into the fundamentals of this proposition may review some of the debates that took place here in 1935 as well as that which is taking place here this afternoon.

The fundamentals of the plan remain the same; first, a goal of $200 per month for every American citizen over 60 years of age; compulsory spending of that amount within 35 days, and a taxation system based on transaction or gross revenue taxes. These are the basic features. The present bill is the result of the extensive hearings recently held before the Ways and Means Committee on H. R. 2, which were acknowledged by Dr. Townsend and all his associates to be full and fair. The criticism that has been made today that there were no hearings on H. R. 6466 is quite beside the point, for outside the tax structure, which is only modified as to rates in certain cases, fundamentally the bill is identical with H. R. 2 on which the Ways and Means Committee spent weeks. As a matter of fact, the proponents of this bill stipulated that the evidence produced with regard to H. R. 2 would equally apply to H. R. 6466.

A careful review of this bill has been made by those of us who are familiar with the other seven proposals. In our opinion, it has all the imperfections of H. R. 2, and as far as I can see, no improvements. Whatever number these bills may carry or however the details may vary from year to year while the fundamental features of the plan just referred to remain, I know that I shall not be wrong in opposing their enactment into law.

The tax that is proposed in this bill is the same thing as a transactions tax, for if the tax is not collected at every transaction in the course of manufacture, it must be paid by the manufacturer, the producer, or the jobber at the end of a whole series of transactions, on the gross value of his sales, and the wage earner and the retailer will be taxed the full 2 percent at the time they receive their wages or at the time they part with title.

The effect of a transactions tax, of course, whether it is paid at the end of a chain or paid as you go along, is to pyramid the cost, and to pyramid the cost at the expense of those least able to bear it, the ultimate consumers. Therefore, it is the most unjust tax that can be placed upon the American public.

I quote from the hearings, page 865:

Mr. Duncan. In considering the probable increase in the cost of commodities to the ultimate consumer, is it not likely that that increased cost would be more than the tax itself that would be imposed as the commodity moves through the various transactions?

Dr. Dewhurst. Well, it would be pyramided, of course, to increase net prices by more than 2 percent, because by the time you get the commodity through all the stages from raw material, adding 2 percent each time until it finally got into the hands of the consumer, the increase would be, as a rule, several times 2 percent. As I say, it would range from 5 to 10 or 12 percent. It is hard to say what it would be.

It would, of course, vary according to the number of transactions entering into each commodity, but that there would be an increase in prices all along the line no one has attempted to deny. In effect, this would mean depreciation of the buying power of the dollar. Perhaps the realization of this is what prompted Dr. Townsend to say that there should be a periodical reexamination of the amount of the annuity, and urged him to call for a further increase of the $200 now suggested to $300.

Hearings, page 597:

Dr. Townsend. I believe every 5 years, once we loosetake off the shackles on technological knowledge and inventiveness—I believe every 5 years we shall have to resurvey the economic condition of this country and raise the standard of retirement for the aged. Two hundred dollars a month will not stay very long. We will go to $300. We must, inevitably.

Hearings, page 655:

Mr. McCormack. When you say you later believe it should go to $300, then you disown the principle at $200 at this time?
Dr. Townsend. No: not the principle at all.

Mr. McCormack. In other words, the $200 is not your objective; it is only a means to an end?

Dr. TOWNSEND. That is all.

If $300 in 5 years, with successive and gradual depreciation of the value of the dollar, restriction of sales, and increase of unemployment, why not $500, $1,000 per month, or more later? This might not be so bad for the aged if their dollar were artificially kept up to par, but what about those under 60 years, whose wages would not go up by similar leaps and bounds? They would not only be taxed on their earnings to pay these annuities, but taxed on every article of food or clothing which they bought at an increased cost, with their impaired dollar.

Dr. Paul Studenski, professor of economics, New York University, presented quite clearly the effect of the proposed taxes on transactions or so-called gross income. At page 953 of the hearings he testified:

The proposed taxes on transactions or so-called gross income, despite their misleading low rate of 2 percent, if ever enacted, would prove to be the most burdensome taxes in the history of this country. The 2-percent tax under either plan, applicable as it would be to each successive turn-over in the production of goods, would make up a total burden of between 10 and 25 percent of the cost of the final product. It is obvious that industry will not be able to absorb such a burden and that the general level of prices would rise simultaneously with the imposition of the tax and commensurately with the rise in the costs of production. The rise in prices would be especially marked in the case of those goods which are the results of the efforts of many enterprises each of which handles the goods in a different stage of production, and where, consequently, the tax would be pyramided many times over.

Confronted with a rise in prices, wage earners, salaried groups, farmers, and recipients of low and medium-sized incomes, generally, would be compelled to spend a larger portion of their incomes on necessities and a smaller one on luxuries. The curtailment of demand on the part of these groups for luxuries would ment of demand on the part of these groups for luxuries would certainly disrupt the industries producing such goods, unless there developed a corresponding increase in demand for these goods from the aged men and women to whom the purchasing power has been transferred. It is conceivable that in the case of some types of consumption goods, such an offsetting increase in demand would take place, with the result that the industries involved would neither gain nor lose from the contemplated transfer of purchasing power Since the requirements of the aged, however, differ materially from those of young people, in the case of mondities, either a net increase in demand or a net decrease, would result. Industries producing goods and services having a commodities, either a net increase in demand or a net decrease, would result. Industries producing goods and services having a particular appeal to the aged would be benefited. Those producing goods and services of little use to the aged, however, would be forced to curtail operations or perhaps to close down altogether. The proposed taxes would result in a great diminution in security transactions. The purely speculative transactions will be taxed out of existence, for the margin of profit thereon is too small to bear such a tax. Consequently, stock exchanges would probably cease operation.

The gentleman who preceded me said no one had told him this afternoon why this tax is unjust. I will tell you why it is unjust. It is unjust because, in the first place, it starts by taxing the baby's milk, the school books of the youth, their education, the food and clothing of the young man and the young woman, as well as the wages of every ditch digger and of every charwoman who scrubs the floor, and those who are making the Nation today and who need every cent to carry on and produce the succeeding generation. For what purpose? Supposedly to put into circulation through the aged, money which their relatively simpler needs—their families having been reared—do not require. But even the aged will be consumers and they, too, will be taxed on their expenditures. The ultimate consumer will pay at both ends of the ladder of life.

The tax is an unjust one because it is a tax prorated among the people on the basis of old age, on the basis of a person having reached a definite age. It is prorated, and that is perhaps the biggest defect there is in the whole proposed system.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUCK. I decline to yield.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman used my name. I thought perhaps the gentleman would yield.

Mr. BUCK. I am sorry, I do not have time to yield.

It is apparent from the discussion this afternoon that there are still many of my good friends on both sides of the House, just as there are at home, who feel that the Townsend plan is a pension plan, a bill to relieve the necessities of the aged. Were that the only effect of the bill, even though the system of taxation proposed is outrageous, it might be seriously considered. However, the proponents of the bill have always said that this is not a pension planit is a recovery plan. My own advocacy of a sound system of assistance and care for the aged needs no defense here today and is a matter of record in legislation such as the Social Security Act that has been passed by the House. In this connection, I may well point out that the aged are already cared for, both under old-age assistance and old-age insurance under that act, and that a new, revised, and liberalized version of the Social Security Act, H. R. 6497, has already been introduced in the House by Chairman Doughton of the Ways and Means Committee as a result of very extensive hearings which our committee has been holding since February 1, 1939. It will be reported very shortly and acted on, I hope, next week. Incidentally, those hearings gave us a full insight into the defects contained in the pending bill. I have no doubt in my mind that our liberalized program will be adopted by the Congress, and that it will be an effective piece of legislation.

Since the proponents of the Townsend bill claim it is a recovery and not a pension plan, it is well to call your attention to the fact that whatever basis it has for consideration depends upon claims that it will bring prosperity through imposed heavy taxes to be diverted into trade channels by compulsory spending. The theory is that by increasing the velocity of money, business prosperity will ensue. It is purely a monetary plan and not a philanthropic program.

I do not know why the aged were picked out as the vehicle through which this velocity of money is supposed to be increased, except that they no doubt have a fundamental appeal to all of us. If the youth of the country, or the farmers, or the veterans, cannot be used as an excuse, why not the aged? Inflation is what our monetary meddlers want, but they have no assurance that the money, once distributed, will continue to speed on its way. There is no assurance that once out of the hands of the annuitant the money will not pile up in the banks or come to rest in some old sock. The pension picture of the aged is just a great, big false face for erratic economics.

The proponents of the bill generally seem to have failed to consider the effect on our national economy of the proposals contained therein to pay uniform and universal benefits to a specified class. The first thought that will occur to you is that these benefits are not paid according to the need of the recipient or according to any economic loss that he may have received. The cost will be tremendous because you include all types of individuals, simply because they have reached a given age. There is not only a high cost but inequity results as well. If no consideration is given to the individual need or the economic loss that a recipient has suffered the payment of a flat pension is bound to result in some people receiving more than others in proportion. Certainly there is bound to result an inequity if $2,400 a year is paid out when it is considered that 89 percent of the families and persons in the United States had incomes of less than $2,500 per year, according to the report of the National Resources Committee in 1935-36, while over 97 percent had incomes of less than $5,000, which is almost the amount that a married couple over 60 would receive under the terms of H. R. 6466. Add to that the considerations that should be taken into effect as to the cost of living in various portions of our country, the economic wage levels of those who are under 60 throughout the entire country, and other factors which have been given no thought apparently by the proponents of this measure, and it obviously stands to reason that there will be a definite and disrupting effect upon the whole economic structure of the United States. The tax on goods sold in export trade may well interefere with our competition in foreign markets; in fact, it would almost inevitably interfere. The tax on imports would not be sufficient to offset the increased costs of home manufactures resulting from the transaction tax as it marched through the process of American production and manufacturing.

There is another objection which stands out. From either the social or administrative standpoint, a prorated pension such as is provided by this bill is most undesirable. You will recall that this total fund is to be prorated among the eligible annuitants without regard to need or economic loss. The amount of the fund is that raised by a tax based on the gross transactions or gross sales value of any given year. In 1934 the base of our gross transactions was less than half of what it was in 1929. Assuming that the old people seriously depended upon these pensions for their livelihood. it would be extremely difficult for them to adjust their standard of living to any level, since the pension might be $50 per month in one year, $35 per month the next, and then bound back again. It would be a physical impossibility to know from month to month what the pension was going to be over a period of 12 months.

There is further no test based on the necessity for relief, and Dr. Townsend does not believe in any such test as is shown by his testimony at pages 609, and 618 of the hearings, which I here insert.

Hearings, page 609:

Mr. McCormack. Under your bill you provide for a pension without regard to whether or not reasonable need exists. That is so, is it not?

Dr. Townsend. I would abolish the needs test entirely.

Hearings, page 618:

Mr. McCormack. Let me get this; need is not the test in order to get a pension?

Dr. TOWNSEND. It shouldn't be.
Mr. McCormack. And it is not intended by you it should be?

Dr. Townsend. No.

But if there is no such test every time there is fluctuation in the amount of the fund raised due to a fluctuation in the gross transactions or gross sales value of any given year, the man who is in need will suffer more than he should because the man who is not in need will still be drawing his pro rata of the pension fund. This is an inequity which I abhor and which alone would justify the defeat of the pending bill.

Now let us consider the other claims of the proponents of the measure. According to them it would relieve unemployment.

Unemployment would be reduced, it is contended, because the retirement of older workers would make room for younger workers. It is assumed that between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 persons over 60 are now at work and would retire. Assuming this is wholly desirable, it would not increase the total volume of employment or decrease the total volume of unemployment. The young would only substitute for the aged. Possibly even the volume of unemployment might be increased, partly because the old people who are now "taken care of" by employers would not be replaced, and partly because the effect of taxes would result in the curtailment of business. Directly there would be neither an increase or a decrease of unemployment. When taxes are considered, there might be a substantial increase of unemployment.

As to the effect on purchasing power and business activity. every bit of testimony that was presented to the Ways and Means Committee indicated that the payment of pensions under this bill could not increase, but could only redistribute income and purchasing power. Obviously the money paid out to the aged would be money which would be spent otherwise if it were not handed over to them. It would be collected in the form of taxes from the younger groups of our country. Hence the purchasing power of persons under 60 would be decreased to the extent that the purchasing power of persons over 60 would be increased. I recall that one of the experts before our committee called our attention to the fact that there was no reason to believe that even if the net purchasing power of consumers could be increased that prosperity would be restored. "At the bottom of the depression." he said, "consumers' expenditures were at a much higher level relative to 1929 than were expenditures for producers, capital goods, and new constructions." (Dr. Dewhurst, hearings, p. 791.) General business revival, it is pretty thoroughly agreed, depends more upon the recovery of expenditure for capital goods and construction than upon the expansion of consumer spending.

There are other glaring inequities in this bill. I do not need to call your attention to the curious and sometimes conflicting phraseology of the bill, because that has been gone into this afternoon by some of the other speakers. I hesitate to talk about its constitutionality although there are some very grave questions, for instance, the tax on sales of manufactured products that are exported from the United States and, for instance, the establishment of a separate fund in the Treasury into which these taxes are to be paid directly. The proponents of the measure have recognized their doubtful position by introducing a constitutional amendment to validate this plan, and the gentleman from Florida today has admitted that he does not know whether the bill is constitutional or not. In the course of the hearings, page 615, the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. McCormack. Well, if the bill is constitutional, there is no necessity for a constitutional amendment.

Dr. Townsenn. I think it would be better.

Mr. McCormack. Do you think you could get an amendment to the Constitution more easily than you could get the passage of this bill through Congress?

Dr. Townsend. Well, probably not more easily, but we would feel easier after we had it.

Every economist who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee testified there would be a rise in prices as a result of the imposition of this pyramiding tax. That it would be ranged from 5 to 12 or more percent, according to the number of transactions that entered into the manufacture of any given commodity, but there is bound to be that rise, and let me tell you that that rise in the price of commodities means a depreciation of your dollar.

Now let us consider what the proposed taxes may yield.

There is a very grave question as to whether the $200 per month, or the $300 which Dr. Townsend envisages, will ever be attained. Since this present bill provides a great many more exemptions from the taxes imposed than any of the previous bills, a complete and accurate estimate of the amount of revenue that would be derived is not available. It would unquestionably be less than the amount of the tax yield which was estimated under H. R. 2, the bill recently abandoned. Taking as a base the statistical table inserted in the hearings at page 85, showing a break-down of the gross transactions of the Nation for 1936, which totaled, according to Mr. Robert R. Nathan, Chief of the Income Section, Division of Economic Research of Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, $449,000,000,000, Dr. J. Frederic Dewhurst, of the Twentieth Century Fund, prepared an estimate of the average monthly pension under H. R. 2. I insert the table, which is found at page 789, volume 1, of the hearings:

Estimated tax yields and pensions payable under H. R. 2

17. Average annual pension under H. R. 2	$612
18. Average monthly pension under H. R. 2	$51

This table indicates that the average monthly pension available could be only $51, allowing nothing for administra-

I was very much interested in what one gentleman said this afternoon to the effect that there would be no additional expense to the United States Government to collect and audit the returns and make the payments, that the Bureau of Internal Revenue and some other agencies could easily handle this. There are about 2,740,000 individuals and partnerships and corporations employing workers at the present time that will have to be checked, while we are only dealing with a limited number of income-tax payers.

Treasury estimates on the bill before us in 1935 indicated an administrative cost of 81/2 percent, which would reduce the net pension by that amount or to the figure of $46.67. Under the new bill with its lower rates on producers and manufacturers, and its additional exemptions the yield would be less than that. The most reliable figures I have indicate that 30 percent of the collections would be on one-half of 1-percent tax basis and 70 percent on a 2-percent basis. Administrative expenses, however, would be greatly increased because under the phraseology of the bill many people, such as producers selling both to wholesalers and directly to consumers would be required to pay the tax on each basis, and auditing of these returns would be extremely complicated and laborious.

When the activities of the Social Security Act take full effect wage records may be built up which will run up payments as high as $85 per month. For the first few years of the operation of the act after benefits begin to be paid the amounts will not reach this level. However, under oldage assistance it is already possible for any State to match Federal funds up to $15, making a total of $30 payable to an aged individual monthly. The question that has disturbed my mind ever since I learned of the Townsend proposals is the effect that they would have on our national economy. Particularly I have wondered whether the very limited increase in the amount of money that the aged would receive was justification for the economic disturbances that would result from the enaction of the Townsend proposals.

The evidence which I have so far presented certainly indicates that these disturbances may well be expected to take place. Even Dr. Townsend recognizes that such disturbances will occur, although he does not seem to be very much concerned about them. As an example of his attitude toward the small-business man, the retailer, and the middleman, I submit excerpts from his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee:

Hearings, page 622:

Mr. McCormack. All right. I am trying to get your state of mind. When you drive out the middleman and bring the producer and consumer closer together, the middleman is closed out;

Dr. Townsend. Sometimes; yes.
Mr. McCormack. And the middleman, on the average, is the small and independent businessman. That is true, isn't it? Dr. Townsend. That is right.

Mr. McCormack. And you can't do that without creating another social problem, because that affects millions of people now employed by the middleman.

Dr. Townsend. Let us create all the jobs we possibly can.
Mr. McCormack. In other words, as a result of this bill the middleman will be closed out. * * *

Dr. Townsend. That is going to happen to him anyway under the present competition.

Mr. McCormack. In other words, he faces extinction?

Dr. Townsend. Yes.
Mr. McCormack. Don't you think we should try and do some-

Dr. Townsend. No; I don't. I think he is a useless appendage in the profit scheme. in the profit scheme.

Hearings, page 625:

Mr. Duncan. I believe you stated to Mr. McCormack that it would probably have the effect of eliminating the middleman to a very large degree.

Dr. Townsend Yes, sir; it might. * * * Mr. Duncan. And you likewise stated that if he couldn't survive under a system of taxation of that kind that he ought to be eliminated.
Dr. Townsend. Yes. * *

Hearings, page 655:

Mr. McCormack. You conceded this morning that the average retail store, the average middleman, would have passed on to him from 8 to 10 transactions taxes, and he could not compete with the large concern that had only 3 transactions taxes. Dr. Townsend. He will not compete.

Mr. McCormack. And he is going to be squeezed out.

Dr. TOWNSEND. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCormack. What is going to happen to him?

Dr. Townsend. He will go into service jobs, the way the rest of the people will.

Mr. McCormack. In other words, business will become highly monopolized in America?

Dr. Townsend. Yes; it is bound to be highly monopolized.

Well, my friends, if that is what you are aiming at, vote for this bill. It is not what I am aiming at at all.

This tax is a tremendous burden, and will be a tremendous burden, also, upon the farmers. You heard me read some of the testimony taken the other day before our committee when the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] was speaking, and the opinion of everyone who appeared before us is that the farmer most of all is the one on whom the incidence of this tax is going to fall first. There appeared before us as a witness Dr. John Lee Coulter, formerly president of the North Dakota Agricultural and Mechanical College, and a former member of the United States Tariff Commission, a recognized expert on both agriculture and economics. In the course of his testimony he stated (page 981, hearings):

My feeling is that the methods proposed in H. R. 2 to raise revenue necessary to put such a program into effect would be a tremendous burden upon agriculture, far out of proportion to the tremendous burden upon agriculture, far out of proportion to the burden on the rest of society; and that the benefits coming to agriculture, if any, would be disproportionately small.

I would like to develop that point just a little. Unless agriculture is able to secure for the products of the soil prices which are reasonably in harmony with other prices, farmers in turn are unable to purchase from the market and their position is disadvantageous.

The reason for that, fundamentally, is that farmers sell their labor in the form of prices received for goods rather than in the form of wages or salaries.

Hearings, page 986:

Let me, then, just briefly go back to these three points, only to enumerate them, and which my study discloses. First, that such a program as this, a method of raising revenue for the purpose stated, would have as its first great repercussion a tremendous increase in the disparity between the status of farmers and other groups. It would come on the one side by the advancing of costs and prices, becoming excessively burdensome to the farmers, and, on the other side, depressing the price of farm products in this country, making their situation even more difficult.

On later examination the following colloguy occurredpage 1002:

Mr. McCormack. Any Member who voted for this bill, who comes from an agricultural district, would be voting directly contrary to the best interests of the people of his district?

Dr. COULTER, I think so,

I endeavored to point out this afternoon that labor, no matter of what type, would be at a decided disadvantage under this bill. While manufacturers are given a one-half of 1-percent tax all wages will be taxed 2 percent. Careful reading of the bill will disclose that statement is true beyond peradventure. The chairman of our committee read you earlier this afternoon from a letter from President Green, of the American Federation of Labor. Let me now quote you testimony given before our committee by Vice President Matthew Woll of the same organization, hearings, page 1351.

Mr. Woll. I thought I had made that very clear in my original presentation, where we said, of course we do not believe in any system that would give benefits to all people regardless of need, and the Townsend bill, of course, is predicated entirely upon right and not on the matter of need. There is no question about it; we are opposed to the Townsend bill, and the principle underlying

Mr. Duncan. If the philosophy underlying the Townsend bill is that of economic recovery rather than relief to the aged—

Mr. Woll. Then it would be only a temporary measure and would not involve a permanent system, unless we are to understand the country is constantly under an economic depression that needs recovery.

Mr. Duncan. And any economic system that would take purchasing power from one group, which is spending all the money it earns, and give it to another group, would not likely increase the purchasing power of the public generally, would it?

Mr. Woll. Nor would it be a sound economic system,

Mr. Duncan. And the transactions tax of 2 percent upon each transaction as a commodity moves in commerce would likely fall more heavily upon the group that you represent than upon any other group in the Nation?

Mr. Woll. We realize that the wage-earning group, representing the great mass of our consumers, is the one ultimately to bear the burden of taxation, no matter what form it takes. Mr. Duncan. And any economic system that would take pur-burden of taxation, no matter what form it takes.

No Representative in Congress who has at heart the welfare of the laboring man can afford to return to his district and report that he voted to tax wages 2 percent and also tax similarly every product that the laboring man has to buy.

Dr. Townsend believes in the principle of enforced spending of the annuity and has had that principle included in this bill. I quote his testimony as shown on page 652 of the hearings:

Mr. McCormack. Do you believe in the principle of enforced spending?

Dr. Townsend. For this coming generation; yes. Mr. McCormack. You do not believe in saving, then? Dr. Townsend. No, sir.

There are some of us who still think that there is a virtue in thrift and a virtue in providing for our own future to the best of our ability. We cannot agree with the principle of a uniform and universal benefit nor with the principle of dissipating income as it may be received. There is not a large enough national income possible in this country to take care of the needs of everyone over 60 without their having done something themselves to supply a reservoir upon which they may likewise draw. For that reason, too, I feel that this bill should be defeated, because it proposes to inculcate in the minds of the coming generation what is a false philosophy.

It is noteworthy that throughout our hearings Dr. Townsend never produced the evidence of a single businessman, a single economist, or a single student or authority on banking and currency in the support of his proposal. He evidently did not care to. I quote from the hearings at page

Mr. McCormack. Have you gotten the opinion of any economist, which opinion supports your claim?

Dr. Townsend. No: and I wouldn't give a hoot for the opinion of the average economist, because they are basing their opinions on events that have passed and gone forever

But, after all, the only way that we can predict the future is in the light of the past and of what we are undergoing at the present. The verdict of disinterested observers has been unanimously against the fundamental principles that this bill represents, and it should be defeated on the evidence of the hearings, if for no other reason.

In conclusion, I again call your attention to the admitted economic disturbances that will follow the adoption of this bill. Not the least of these is that it proposes to repeal, effective immediately, titles I, II, and VIII of the Social Security Act, dissolving every State old-age assistance plan in the United States by withdrawing Federal aid, depriving workers who have obtained wage credits under title II of the benefits that they may some day receive, and for what purpose? That for the next 4 months and 19 days following the enactment of this law there may be collected into the Treasury of the United States an enormous sum to be hoarded there against the day when the first annuities shall be payable under this bill. If the intention of the proponents of the bill is to bring about an inflationary effect on our currency in the long run, certainly the immediate effect will be deflationary to a high degree, and it may be that some of our industries will never be able to recover from that 4 months and 19 days. As Dr. Craig, the president of the American Retail Federation, told the committee, if we just put through some scheme which cannot be borne financially it will collapse and everybody will suffer. Let us not take that fatal step today.

I have not spoken of the phraseology of the bill, of the half-baked condition in which it has been presented. Your attention has been called to that by others. It does not require legislative counsel to recognize the absurdity of some of the language or to see at once the defects and contradictions of the section on definition and that on taxation. No one who claims that he is entitled to recognition as a legislator, no matter what his views may be on the principle of the Townsend plan, can afford to vote today to pass this monstrosity. None of you can afford to assume responsibility for the results that this bill will accomplish. The economic revolution which its proponents have predicted would result from its enactment would be the revolution of the laborer, the retailer, and the farmer against the bill itself.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ANGELL].

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Chairman, we are not going to kill the Townsend bill by barroom jokes or by ridicule.

I put in the RECORD a short time ago a report of resolutions from 18 sovereign States of the United States of America that have petitioned this Congress to take some action on this proposed legislation. I challenge anyone to produce any other measure where so many States of the Union by formal action of their State legislatures have petitioned the Congress, as they have a right to do under the Constitution, to give heed to a piece of legislation.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. ANGELL. I am sorry: I have not the time to yield.

In addition to that, in my own State this matter was placed upon the ballot in a formal election and 183,000 of my fellow citizens voted in favor of a constitutional amendment embodying this Townsend legislation. Almost every State in the Union, and I believe every single State in the Union, has numerous clubs belonging to the Townsend organization from Oregon to Maine and from Canada to the Gulf. They are intelligent, honest, straightforward Americans, and that is the reason I stated in my opening that you cannot, by jokes or by ridicule, kill a movement of this sort, because, fundamentally, it has as its purpose taking care of the old people of America, those men and women who have led the way in making America what it is today. They have turned America over to you and to me. It is our duty when these old folks have been thrown out of employment by our industrial system to provide for their care and support in a decent American way. This legislation will do that. We have voted billions for war and other activities but we lose our voices when we are asked to vote for an adequate old-age pension. The Ways and Means Committee has had this legislation under consideration for 4 years. They have had hearings on it for almost 4 months of this session. The committee now brings the legislation to the floor of the House and have not suggested a single change or amendment. Neither have they presented any substitute bill in its place. If we are sincere in our support of adequate old-age pensions, we should vote for this bill. It is our only opportunity to vote for such legislation. The amendments now proposed to the social-security law will not provide for our old people. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration, H. R. 6466, is known as the General Welfare Act and embodies the Townsend program for national recovery and old-age assistance. In the Seventy-fifth Congress the bill was known as H. R. 4199, which bill was reintroduced in the Seventy-sixth Congress and carries the title H. R. 2. The present bill, H. R. 6466, is identical with H. R. 2 with the exception that it carries Dr. Townsend's amendments, chief of which is the change in the tax formula. The purpose of this bill, as defined in its title, is to provide for and promote the general welfare of the United States by supplying to the people a more liberal distribution and increase of purchasing power, retiring certain citizens from gainful employment, improving and stabilizing gainful employment for other citizens, stimulating agricultural and industrial production and general business, and alleviating the hazards and insecurity of old age and unemployment; to provide a method whereby citizens shall contribute to the purchase of and receive a retirement annuity; to provide for the raising of the necessary revenue to operate a continuing plan therefor; and to provide for the appropriation and expenditure of such revenue.

Many people to whose attention this program has been called misconceive its purpose. A great many of our people have been led to believe it is a scheme for the redistribution of wealth and the payment to our citizens who are 60 years of age or older the sum of $200 per month. As a matter of fact, the purposes of the act are twofold: First, to provide for a solution of our economic troubles with which we have been wrestling now for almost 10 years; and, secondly, to provide a reasonable income for our senior citizens 60 years of age or over sufficient to care for their needs according to the American way of living. The program is national in scope and will permit every person in the United States who is 60 years of age or over or who attains that age after the passage of the act, and who has been a citizen for at least 5 full years, to receive the benefits provided by the act, namely, an annuity payable monthly during life. The annuity shall begin the first day of the calendar month following the approval of the application by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is provided that the annuitant shall not engage in any gainful pursuit and is required to spend all of each month's annuity during the calendar month for which it is received, or within 5 days thereafter, within the United States or its Territorial possessions or while traveling between the States and such Territorial possessions. The annuity funds must be spent for services rendered by citizens of the United States, commodities manufactured in the United States, the purchase or rental of a home, or for the support of a dependent spouse and children. Certain portions may be expended for debts and to purchase life insurance. A person forcibly confined in any penal or other institution is not entitled to the annuity. Any portion or all of the annuity may be waived, and the receipt thereof is voluntary.

General supervision of the act is placed on the Secretary of the Treasury, who mails out the annuity checks monthly from Washington, D. C. Forms of applications for the annuities are made available under the act through the Post Office Department, and returns shall be filed with the local post office. Local postmasters are authorized to administer oaths on returns requested to be filed for the annuities, for which a 25-cent charge for each verification is made. An applicant for an annuity may secure legal advice with respect thereto from the United States district attorney for the district in which he resides. Provision is also made for jurisdiction in the United States court in an informal proceeding to hear petitions of any annuitant who feels aggreved. The filing fee for such petitions is $1. There shall be no other court cost in connection with such hearings and determinations.

In order to provide funds for carrying cut the provisions of the act a gross-income or business tax is imposed. It provides a privilege tax of one-half of 1 percent on persons engaged generally in the business of selling tangible personal property as a producer or in selling at wholesale any tangible property, or in manufacturing any articles or commodities. There is a tax of 2 percent imposed on all others engaged in any business, trade, occupation, or calling. National banks and certain other societies and organizations which do not operate for profit are exempted from the act. Returns must be made by those subject to the tax monthly at the end of each calendar month during which such taxes become fixed and chargeable. The return is mandatory and must be sworn to, and the return delivered within 10 days from the expiration of the calendar month which it covers. The Secretary of the Treasury is charged with the responsibility of enforcing the payment of the taxes and depositing the same in the United States Treasury, which are required to be kept in a separate fund in the Treasury Department to be known and administered as the general welfare fund. Provision is also made that all such revenue shall be disbursed only for the payment of sums expressly authorized by the act and for no other purpose.

It is provided that the funds thus collected shall be used for the payment of proper and necessary expenses of administration, and the balance shall be paid and distributed pro rata monthly to all qualified annuitants who are of record and whose applications for annuities have been approved, at the end of the twentieth day after the last day of the calendar month for which the revenues are collected. The total amount of funds available for distribution under the terms of the act shall be divided by the total number of annuitants entitled to share therein, and the result shall be the pro rata amount to be distributed to each respectively. The amount which will be available for distribution to the annuitants, therefore, is a variable sum and can only be determined at expiration of each month, measured by the receipts from the tax imposed. However, there is a ceiling of $200 per month to any one annuitant. It is generally conceded under existing economic conditions and the volume of business now being conducted in the United States that the maximum payment will not be reached; in fact, Dr. Townsend has been quoted as saying recently that under present business conditions it is not expected that a sum in excess of $50 a month will be available.

In broad outline the plan is a simple one, providing the imposition of a gross income or business tax graduated to promote the general welfare and to provide a fund for meeting old-age annuities on a pay-as-you-go basis. It is believed that the increased volume of trade which will result from the purchasing power made available through these annuities will enable business generally to go forward, and that this much-needed stimulus to business will largely relieve those engaged therein from the burden of the tax. It is argued that the imposition of such a tax will increase prices to the consumer. This is not necessarily true. If by reason of the incentive given to business by the creation this large purchasing power and the resulting increase in business activity among those who must produce the merchandise and goods to supply this trade, merchants and others who must pay the tax are able to increase their volume of sales, they may still sell at the same unit price and receive profits largely in excess of those previously received. This principle was clearly demonstrated in the growth and development of the automotive industry. Automobiles today may be purchased for a price equal or below the price obtaining when the industry was new, notwithstanding the automobiles now being sold are doubled in value. The whole chain-store idea is based on large volume and frequent turn-over of capital investment with low-unit profits.

Under the General Welfare Act the public will be benefited by the elimination of a large portion of the expenditures now being required for relief, W. P. A., community care for the aged, and for unemployment generally. Administrative expenditures for W. P. A. were in excess of $5,000,000 a month from July 1938 to January 1939. Four million dollars a month was spent for personal services. There were 1,902 administrative employees in Washington and 32,670 in the field. Their salaries range up to $9,000 a year. The monthly W. P. A. expenses for travel and subsistence is $500,000. Telegrams and telephones cost $150.-000. In 1936 the W. P. A. expenditures aggregated $1,270,-235,065; in 1937, $1,833,456,971, and in 1938 they totaled $1,427,701,994. For the current fiscal year they are the stupendous sum of $2,250,000,000. In January 1938 there were 1,900,000 persons on W. P. A. pay rolls. In January 1939 the number had increased to 2,996,000 persons. In 1913, the Federal Government had 469,000 civil employees, and in 1939 the number was 863,000. In 1913, the carrying charge on the public debt was $22,900,000, and in 1938, $926,200,000-40 times as much. In 1913, the total expenditure of the Federal Government was $724,500,000, and in 1938, $7,700,-000,000-an increase of 961 percent. This record clearly demonstrates this program has not stimulated private employment and it is not the answer to the unemployment

A considerable number of those who will qualify under this law as annuitants are engaged in gainful pursuits, and the positions held by them will be freed for younger citizens. A survey by the Brookings Institution shows American resources and plant capacities are ample to provide the American standard of living for all of our citizens, and under mass production as now carried on in the United States there is sufficient manpower under the age of 60 to man the machines and do all the Nation's work. Under this program those 60 years of age or over who are the beneficiaries of the program are not drones deriving their sustenance from the community at large. They are American citizens who have done their share in carrying on the work of the Nation during the productive years of their lives. Under the stern economic rules of the machine age in which we live workmen, who by reason of age are unable to keep the pace set by relentless competition in mass production, must step aside. They must give way to younger workmen. Society, which by its laws permits this condition to exist, and industry, which profits by it. must assume responsibility for the workmen cast off the pay rolls and provide for those who are no longer permitted to follow gainful pursuits. They are cast aside by industry, and industry in turn must assume the burden of their care. Industry should welcome a universal tax for that purpose. The law being universal in its application will give the same opportunity to every citizen of 5 years' standing upon attaining the age of 60 years. Those who contribute today may be the recipients of the annuity tomorrow. The tax takes its toll from every transaction, which spreads its burdens to everyone. Our present-day industrial system, with mass production and the profit motive, cannot escape its responsibility if it is to endure. It cannot cast off its worn-out workers when they reach 60 years like old horses turned out to shift for themselves or die. Industry, which has created this backwash of discarded laborers too old to carry on, must assume the responsibility of caring for them. The Townsend plan will require industry to do this. A small tax on industry will create the fund to retire these workers. The only plan that will work must be universal, covering all groups and all citizens who attain the required age and who wish to participate. It is based in broad outline upon the same underlying principle as that in the existing Social Security Act, in that all citizens of the Nation are contributing to this fund to provide annuities for everyone upon attaining the age of 60 years who desires to avail himself of its privileges. The Social Security Act applies only to limited groups, while this act will apply to all groups.

After 8 years of the depression there are still substantially over 10,000,000 of our people unemployed. There are approximately 3,000,000 on relief. Trade channels are clogged, and the wheels of industry to a large extent are motionless, and our whole economic and social structure is bogged down. The social-security program, the relief set-up, borrowing and spending, and all other remedial legislation that has been enacted to solve these problems have failed miserably to bring back prosperity.

The social-security program for old-age assistance has not worked out as planned. It was a commendable effort looking toward social justice. Its old-age relief program needs fundamental amendment. On August 14, 1935, our Social Security Act became effective. It is computed that under title II there will have been collected up to June 30, 1940, $1,826,000,000. This is exacted from the industries of America and some 40,000,000 workers. Out of this huge sum, however, we will have paid only $60,000,000 to the beneficiaries. Approximately 3 cents out of each dollar will go to the beneficiaries and 97 cents for the reserve account. The employers are now taxed 1 percent of the pay rolls and the employees a like amount. The employers, however, are paying 3 percent for unemployment insurance.

Under the schedules of the act these taxes will increase until 1949, when the employers will be required to pay 6 percent and the employees 3 percent, making a 9-percent payroll tax taken directly out of industry. It is patent that this tax is and will be added to the cost of the goods produced and, therefore, will fall upon the consuming public. Should the provisions of this act be carried out and the full amount of taxes exacted, the reserve account will have, by 1980, nearly $47,000,000,000. Furthermore, the social-security law is much restricted in its application and affords relief to only a selected group of workers rather than to all senior citizens equally deserving. This huge sum of money exacted from industry and workers is not being devoted to the relief of the beneficiaries, the workers, but is being used to finance the ordinary activities of the Government. Statisticians and economists tell us that it is not necessary to carry a full reserve account to protect these payments. This is apparent to the layman as well. These funds collected as trust funds. having been spent by the Federal Government to meet its running expenses, necessitate the levying of taxes hereafter to pay the beneficiaries as the obligations become due. The plan should be revised, or superseded by another plan, so framed as to cover all senior citizens 60 years of age or over. and with tax provisions designed to raise only such funds as are needed on a pay-as-you-go basis, with a contingency fund sufficient only to meet emergencies. The funds so raised should be restricted to the use for which they were raised.

Mr. Roger W. Babson, the outstanding financial expert,

If the social-security system is not changed, I doubt very much if the young people of 20 to 30 years of age will ever receive any benefit from it. When their time arrives to get their $40, $50, or $60 monthly Government check, it may not even buy a pair of shoes or a roast of beef. The Townsend plan, on some reasonable basis, is far safer.

And the economist, John T. Flynn, testifying before the Ways and Means Committee of the House, said:

Over the next 40 years what they are actually going to do under the guise of creating a reserve is to collect $47,000,000,000 more than they pay out, and this $47,000,000,000 is never going to be paid back in any form to the social-security system.

I want the Government to stop collecting money it is not going to use for social security. * * * Next year it is going to take $714,000,000: it is going to pay out $22,000,000 in benefits and spend $52,000,000 to run the system, making $74,000,000 in all, and it is going to borrow the balance and use it to pay the expenses of running the Government—maybe buy a battleship or two and a few other things. That mapper is never going to buyed for social few other things. That money is never going to be used for social

Dr. A. L. Epstein, executive secretary of the American Association for Social Security, referring to the social-security law for old age, said:

Moreover, to the extent that our system, contrary to that of any other nation, and therefore, again, to the extent that our system contemplates the private insurance system seeks to build up in the worst years of depression, in the years when we need every penny we earn to spend, in years when we are saving all our lives to get money for that purpose, when we in these years of the worst depression are trying to save money, then trying to take out in taxes billions of dollars more than we are actually paying in benefits, obviously what you are doing is deliberately not to create social security, not to increase or enhance security of the workers, but deliberately to decrease the purchasing power of the workers and to enhance unemployment and enhance depression.

The immense sums of money being exacted from employers and employees under the social-security program for old-age assistance are being spent as received for carrying on the ordinary activities of the Government. In the place of the tax dollars he has collected, Uncle Sam is placing I O U's in the till. Eventually when these annuities must be paid the Government will have to levy another tax upon the American people to meet these obligations. This in effect is a fraud upon industry and upon our workmen who are compelled to pay these taxes. The taxpayer's burden has increased threefold in the last 7 years, notwithstanding that our deficit has averaged $3,000,000,000 a year, and the public debt has increased over twenty-three billions, now exceeding forty billions. We are piling this immense debt on the backs of future generations and are squandering the borrowed money on ourselves.

Under this bill, section 9, titles I, II, and VIII of the Social Security Act are repealed and these heavy burdens placed upon employers and workers will be eliminated. In its place will be substituted a pay-as-you-go program; the moneys collected from business transactions will be used as collected for paying the annuities, and this large volume of money at once will go back in the channels of trade and will constitute the blood stream of industry.

Dr. Arthur J. Altmeyer, Chairman of the Social Security Board, before the Ways and Means Committee, said:

The unemployment compensation funds collected from em-

The unemployment compensation funds collected from employers, and in a few States from employees also, are usually spent immediately for food, clothing, shelter, and other family essentials. In other words, they go back into the community from the cash register of the local merchant. They flow right into the business of the State and the Nation.

Experience has already proved that benefit payments help to maintain workers' purchasing power and thereby to stimulate lagging business and industrial activity. This is particularly evident in a small, one-industry community, where lack of work in the past has meant that a large part of the wage-earning population was deprived of income. In such communities as well as in lation was deprived of income. In such communities, as well as in larger cities, the payment of benefits to unemployed workers during the last recession has prevented serious losses to retail business and to the service industry, and as a result has tended to maintain employment levels in those businesses.

The great need of America today is purchasing power in the hands of the rank and file of our people. America is a rich nation. It is blessed with immense natural resources. We have the greatest industrial plants and hydroelectric power of any nation ready to start production. We have idle manpower, skilled and intelligent, waiting for the green light. We have two-thirds of the world's gold supply and our banks and savings institutions are bulging with money awaiting investment. If normal purchasing power were restored to America, these funds could be released in investments, restoring and increasing our industrial plants and manufactories to take care of the immense volume of trade that would arise. These savings locked up in depositories means stagnation in business and unemployment. Much of it should be released in the heavy-goods industries. We have the great American market, the finest in the world, waiting to purchase the commodities of our field and factory. This market is equal to 500,-000,000 Europeans and 1,000,000,000 Asiatics. The whole economic and industrial machine only awaits the formula which will start the wheels turning. With purchasing power restored will come jobs for the unemployed and purchasers for our commodities from the farms, the mills, and the industries. The purchasing power provided for in this bill will supply this need. The forced spending for American goods will bring business revival and relieve unemployment. At the same time we will be giving decent treatment to our old people, many of whom now are in dire want.

The American people are pension minded. The Gallup poll recently made shows that 94 percent of our people favor a reasonable old-age pension. Eighteen States of the Union have petitioned Congress to consider this legislation, namely, Arizona, California, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Indiana, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, Washington, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

This plan is not merely a pension program, but provides for national recovery and is a philosophy of life founded upon sound American principles. The legions of supporters of the movement in every State of the Union are loyal, patriotic, earnest American citizens pledged:

First. To uphold and defend the Constitution of the United Second. To stand against the surrender of any of our traditional American liberties.

Third. To oppose fascism, communism, or any other form of dictatorship which may menace the traditional form of American government.

Fourth. To strive for a higher standard of living for the underprivileged classes.

Fifth. To stand as a safeguard of the American tradition against racial, political, or religious intolerance.

Sixth. To foster and promote better citizenship by educating the voters to safeguard their own interests.

The haphazard old-age pension laws as they are being administered in the 48 States are a poor subterfuge for old-age assistance. The monthly payments vary in every State and usually in every county. The reports of the Social Security Board show the average payments last year ranged from $4.74 in Mississippi to $32.30 in California. A miserable pittance for the full care and support of our old people. America, the richest nation on earth, should bow its head in shame at such pittance for our old folks who made America and gave it to us.

The old-age security law has failed to solve this social problem of affording relief to our old people; on the other hand, it has exacted unnecessary, burdensome taxes from workers and employers alike, impeding business and halting recovery. It is limited in its applications to selected groups. It rests upon the fiction that these taxes are to be used for relief payments, whereas the money is immediately spent for Government activities. It stifles industry and robs the wage earner, giving little relief. The Townsend plan, on the other hand, is a pay-as-you-go program. It is universal throughout the United States in its application, covering all citizens 60 years of age or over, otherwise qualified. It is a sound American plan. It will create purchasing power. It will start mills and factories. It will provide pay rolls. It will afford an immense market for American products and will lead America back onto the high road to prosperity. It will provide food, clothing, and shelter for our senior citizens, many of whom are now destitute.

Mr. Chairman, I believe no legislation now pending before this Congress or which has had the attention of the Congress in the last several sessions has received more universal approval than the Townsend program. Almost half of the States of the Union through formal action of their legislative bodies, as I have heretofore shown, have urged upon the Congress to give attention to this legislation. From every city, hamlet, and countryside all over our Nation from Maine to Oregon come to us the pleas of our fellow countrymen to enact this legislation. My own State legislature and 183,781 of my fellow citizens, a majority by popular vote at a regular election, have urged this course. For 5 years they have been waiting for the enactment of this program. I urge you to give the bill your approval.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROUTZOHN].

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Chairman, I would not impose myself upon the Members of the House this afternoon if I did not feel that I might have something constructive to offer. We have had a general debate here this afternoon and are nearing the close of the time limit. Up until this time, and I have listened attentively, I have heard nothing more than an apology on the one hand and ridicule on the other because of the admitted weakness of the bill. We have just heard expressed on the floor of this House by the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck] that the Townsend plan has been in this House under consideration for 4 years, since 1935, I believe the gentleman said. It seems to me that within 4 years we should have been able to solve the old-age pension problem, but we have not, and the indications are that this bill is not going to be passed this afternoon or tomorrow morning. I believe the vote is scheduled for tomorrow morning. That means that we will not solve the problem this year. The most cruel and inhuman treatment that we can possibly inflict upon the old people is to continually buoy up their hopes and then do nothing for them but merely discuss their problem, as we discuss the weather, and do nothing about it.

During my campaign for election to Congress in the fall of 1938 I received the support of the regular Townsend organizations, notwithstanding the fact that a third candidate in the field was an avowed Townsendite.

The national Townsend organization approved my candidacy over that of this third candidate who ran as an independent, my other opponent being the incumbent who was then on record as unalterably opposed to the Townsend plan.

Furthermore, a number of fine men and women who were loyal members of the Townsend clubs in my district worked diligently and faithfully in my behalf.

On October 23, 1938, a meeting was held in Memorial Hall, Dayton, Ohio, when L. W. Jeffery, vice president of the national Townsend organization, and my good friend, the Honorable Ralph O. Brewster, spoke in favor of my candidacy.

At that meeting I read the following as a statement of my position regarding the Townsend plan:

If elected, I shall do everything in my power to obtain proper and fair hearings of the Townsend plan before the committee. If such hearings are denied, I will be glad to join in a petition to bring the proposal to the floor for adequate discussion, and thus let every Member go on record. Hearings before the committee or in the House will allow the Townsend organization the opportunity to prove the merits they claim for their program. If these claims can be established as meritorious, naturally I will support it as, I believe, every other well-meaning Congressman will then do.

The third candidate heretofore referred to used this statement as evidence of my failure to commit myself in favor of the legislation specifically proposed by the Townsend organization. At no time have I minimized or attempted to minimize the results obtained through the work and support of the Townsend organization and its members. At no time have I ceased to be grateful to both organization and membership for their generous efforts in my behalf. Also, at no time has the organization or anyone in authority asked, or attempted to exact, any more from me than what I voluntarily offered in the statement just quoted.

Referring to my statement, it now can be said that Dr. Townsend has admitted that the Ways and Means Committee has granted to him and his witnesses a full, fair, and complete hearing. Although it did not report his bill out favorably, it did the next best thing by reporting the bill without recommendation. Also, it is conceded that the Townsend movement has been rewarded by a consideration of the bill this day on the floor of the House.

Personally, I would have much preferred a rule which would have permitted a longer time for debate and also would have permitted amendments to the bill.

Still referring to my statement, ever since I made that statement I have devoted a great deal of thought, research, and effort in order to acquaint myself with the subject matter of the proposed legislation. I also have sought the advice and counsel of those connected with the movement.

This was done, all of it, in the hope that I might cooperate as much as my understanding and convictions would permit. My attitude has at all times been, and still is, friendly and with a desire to be of practical help in solving the old-age problem.

While the plan has never appealed to me as a recovery measure, I am profoundly interested in the desire to solve the problem of adequately supporting and maintaining the aged. For many years I have been a director of the Montgomery County (Ohio) Humane Society, the functions of which deal in part with the care of the aged. For many years I have been a member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, the original organization to agitate and sponsor old-age pension legislation. I retained my membership in this organization principally because of its constructive and effective work performed in behalf of the aged throughout the States of the Union.

I have stated these things as what I consider positive proof of my interest in old-age pensions and unaffected by any political considerations.

The bill before us for consideration contains departures from the taxation proposed in the original bill, known as H. R. 2. I regret that this bill was not filed at a date earlier than May 23, which, if filed earlier, would have permitted the obtaining of more information as to its practicability.

However, one need go no further than to consider the constitutionality of its provisions in determining whether or not he would be warranted in supporting the bill.

In the light of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States heretofore rendered, it is obvious to anyone trained in the law that before this bill would ever become effective as law it would be subjected to attacks in the courts on the ground of its unconstitutionality.

Dr. Townsend has long since been advised of this legal impediment, and I have been informed that he wrote the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee suggesting a constitutional amendment which would provide for the levying of a tax and the earmarking of the funds derived therefrom for old-age pension purposes.

Bills have been introduced by friends of the Townsend plan, who have been cooperating with Dr. Townsend, to submit such a constitutional amendment. Thus, it cannot be said that I question the constitutionality of the bill as a subterfuge.

It has been suggested that the Congress pass the bill and at the same time pass on to the courts the responsibility of determining the constitutionality of the provisions of the proposed legislation. I cannot countenance such a suggestion. The oath of a Congressman implies, even if it does not specifically state, that a Congressman shall conform to the Constitution in the performance of his duties in enacting legislation as much as a Justice of the Supreme Court in his decisions must abide by the Constitution.

Nor can I consider the argument that the social-security law contains unconstitutional provisions, as an excuse for supporting this measure. Two wrongs never can make one right.

Heretofore, at this session of the Congress, I have voted against certain other proposed legislation because I considered such legislation unconstitutional. In my best judgment this proposed bill is unconstitutional and my sense of duty impels me to vote against it because of this fact.

It is, therefore, unnecessary for me to discuss the feasibility and practicability of the plan outlined in the bill. It would be unjust and unfair, yes, inhumane and cruel, to pass this bill and thereby raise false hopes in the hearts and minds of those who are expectantly yearning for the enactment of a law that will give them protection against want and misery in their declining years.

It would be better for the old folks if no law ever were passed providing pensions for them than to pass a law that would not fit into the governmental and economic structure of our Nation. The present patchwork of social security and old-age pension enactments is anything but practical, adequate, or comforting.

Some general law must and eventually will be evolved and will meet the needs that all fair-minded citizens will admit exist.

I have earnestly desired and sought for enlightenment on this subject that I might be helpful in solving the problem. I have not, at least at this time, any panacea to offer. I have recognized the fact that the anxiety of our aged people for protection and help furnishes a temptation to exploit the aged and work upon their sympathies and gullibility.

I also have noted that the old-age pension problem is apt to become a bone of contention for party and partisan strife.

I, therefore, have a plan to submit that will, in my judgment, tend to clear the way and to eliminate predatory schemes and party issues.

The plan is simply the creation of a bipartisan and, if possible, thereby a nonpartisan commission that will be charged with the duty of submitting to the Congress a report based upon a thorough and complete investigation of all plans now proposed or later suggested to the commission.

My thought of removing the commission from all partisanship is by the appointment of 11 individuals, 4 from the Members of the House, 4 from the Senate, and 3 to be appointed by the President. The Presidential appointees are to come from private life.

I shall file a joint resolution embodying my plan after vote is taken on the pending bill, assuming that a motion to recommit, which the Republicans will offer as a constructive measure, will be defeated, and likewise assuming that the bill will be defeated.

I ask you to consider this modest contribution of mine and add to or subtract from its provisions whatever you may deem fit and proper under the circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have studied the principles of the Townsend old-age pension and national-recovery plan for the past 5 years and am now the only member of the first steering committee, organized in 1935, who is still serving in Congress, and I am still serving actively on the steering committee. During all this period we have had the support and cooperation of many fine, able, patriotic Members of this House, and they are all entitled to share in the credit for the progress which we have made with this legislation. As is the case with all major legislation, we have had a difficult struggle in advancing our various bills and have encountered the usual opposition to all our proposals, much of which has been founded upon misunder-standing and misinformation.

H. R. 2-H. R. 6466

At the beginning of this session H. R. 2 was introduced by our colleague from Florida [Mr. Hendricks]. It provided for the payment, financing, and compulsory expenditure of a Federal monthly old-age pension of not to exceed $200 per month to all law-abiding citizens 60 years of age and past by levying a 2-percent transactions tax. That has been the proposal which I have discussed here in Congress and before many public gatherings held in many of the largest cities in the country, and before two national conventions, and which I presented at some length during the recent hearings before the Ways and Means Committee. With that proposal and all its various phases I have become thoroughly familiar and have accumulated a mass of statistical and factual information relating thereto.

Now a new bill has been introduced by the gentleman from Florida, H. R. 6466, at the request of Dr. Townsend. It is substantially the same as H. R. 2 and previous Townsend bills save and except that it provides for a slightly different tax formula. Instead of a 2-percent over-all transactions tax, it provides for a tax of one-half of 1 percent on producers, manufacturers, wholesalers, and jobbers, and 2 percent on retailers, and follows more closely the tax system which has proven such an outstanding success in the Hawaiian Islands. This is a somewhat narrower tax base and not as broad a tax base as a universal transactions tax and would probably not provide as large and prolific a source of revenue. However, I feel that the difference is not great enough to cause any sincere supporter and advocate of the Townsend plan to oppose it on that account, and, therefore, I am accepting the change, although I still prefer the original Townsend bill (H. R. 2). Of course, it does render it impractical and quite impossible for me to use for argumentative purposes some of the facts, figures, and illustrations which I have assembled during the past 5 years of my advocacy of a plan based upon and to be financed by the revenues derived from an all-inclusive 2-percent transactions tax.

TAX FORMULA SIMILAR TO THAT FAVORED IN 1921

The tax formula in the present modified bill is similar to that endorsed by the largest business organizations in America in 1921, in the extended hearings which were held before the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, Hon. Reed Smoot, of Utah, chairman.

On April 5, 1920, from New York, the Business Men's National Tax Committee issued a bulletin in which it said in part:

It could be collected monthly * * * without the slightest strain on business or the banks * * * it would definitely fix the amount of tax due to the Government at the time of the sale. * * * It is very simple of administration. * * * The books of the taxpayer will automatically furnish the basis for computing the tax. * * * The ultimate cost to the consumer of a pyramided 1-percent tax, even if shifted by each taxpayer, will rarely exceed 2½ or 3 percent. * * * The average number of turn-overs will probably not exceed 5; but even with 10 turn-overs, if the 1-percent tax was shifted each time, the burden on the final consumer would not exceed 5 percent.

The administrative task would be greatly simplified. * *

An all-inclusive turn-over tax is practically sound

Meyer D. Rothschild, chairman of the Business Men's National Tax Committe, testified (on p. 196) in support of the transactions tax:

We believe this to be the fairest, most equitable, widely spread, and easily administered tax which can be levied upon business. * * * This form of tax has been carefully investigated by our industry and unanimously indorsed.

Mr. Rothschild filed with the Senate committee (May 20, 1921) what he called a "Primer" on the subject of a 1percent transactions tax. It contained an estimate of the amount of the tax on various commodities, compiled by the firms that produced them. Here are some of these estimates taken from the official Senate record:

Granulated sugar, tax estimated by Seeman Bros., of New York, 3.44 percent.

Bread, tax estimated by William C. Cornwell, editor Bache Re-view, from information obtained from various wholesale and retail dealers in New York City, 2 percent.

Beef, tax estimated from figures obtained from Armour & Co.,

1.87 percent.

Pork, tax estimated from figures obtained from Armour & Co., 1.87 percent.

Suit of men's clothing retailing at $40, tax estimated from figures obtained from William Goldman, of New York, 2.34 percent. Pa'r of men's shoes retailing at $7, tax estimated by R. H. Hazzard, of Gardiner, Maine, 3.30 percent.

Pair of gloves retailing at $2.25, tax estimated by prominent glove manufacturer, 2.80 percent.

Automobile tire retailing at $35.10, tax estimated by president of the Ajax Rubber Co., 3.25 percent.

Farm machinery: One of the largest manufacturers of farming implements and machinery has given us the following information:

Owing to the variety of materials entering into the manufacture of the bulk of our products, it is not possible to furnish you with a detailed statement similar to that submitted to you in the case of a suit of clothes. We have, however, carefully analyzed some of our principal machines and, taking all the various factors into consideration, we assume that the total furnover tax in our complicated industry will be equivalent to about 3 to 3½ percent of the retail price of our machines to the consumer.

Hugh Satterlee, representing the Trades Council of Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, on page 31, gave this testimony:

I believe * * * that the most practical tax is a turnover tax on goods, wares, and merchandise * * *. No taxes can be entirely equal * * *. Where every commodity is taxed 1 percent people are not discouraged from buying commodities, but where one particular commodity is taxed 10 percent or higher and other commodities which satisfy the same general needs of the consumer are not taxed at all, the manufacturer who makes and sells that particular commodity loses business * * *. Under sells that particular commodity loses business * * *. Under the turnover tax the man who spent $100,000 would pay 100 times as much tax as the man who spent $1,000.

C. H. Smith, of the Westinghouse Airbrake Co., Pittsburgh, representing the tax committee of the National Association of Manufacturers, on page 53, testified and in answer to the question put to him by Boise Penrose, then chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, as to the kind of a tax he favored, said:

A gross sales tax on all turnovers.

Then Chairman Penrose asked:

You urge it on account of its simplicity and convenience?

And Mr Smith replied:

Absolutely.

Lebbeus S. Wilfley, representing the Tax League of America, on page 65, former Attorney General of the Philippine Islands, gave this testimony in support of the turnover tax:

I represent the Tax League of America * *. It embraces about 13 States * * *. It (turnover tax) will completely, promptly, and economically collect and furnish a flow of revenue that will be constant and dependable * * *. It will be paid by the whole body of the people, each paying in proportion to the amount of goods he consumes * * *. There is a general feeling that in many lines of industry the turnovers are so numerous that the sales tax will pyramid and accumulate until it becomes a very considerable amount. This is not true * * *. It will be observed that in the creation of a suit of clothes there are normally seven turnovers and that the total tax amounts to about 2½ percent. (This is based on a 1-percent transaction tax.)

Frederick E. Kip, given as "a prominent manufacturer and tax authority" of Montclair, N. J., not only endorsed the transaction of turnover tax but also applied it to the wage worker as a stimulant to employment. He said, on pages 255 and 256:

Our workers now, as in the winter of 1913, would far rather contribute their share to our Federal expenses through a turnover tax (releasing funds to flow back into industry) and thereby obtain steadier employment and wages. * * If a worker is out of employment 1 week, it will cost him at least twice what he would pay for a whole year through any 1-percent turnover tax.

Then, addressing the farmers and pointing out the benefits to them, on page 257, Mr. Kip added:

Nearly all farmers are today in dire need of cash funds to help over the present disastrous period. * * * Therefore, our hearly all farmers are today in dire heed of cash runds to help them over the present disastrous period. * * Therefore, our farmers are also vitally interested and should be enthusiastically in favor of the present proposed law. * * It is estimated that the 1-percent turnover tax on all commodities and merchandise will add 2½ to 3 percent. In no case, however, can it add more than 3½ percent. more than 31/2 percent.

SIR JOHN AIRD RECOMMENDED TURN-OVER TAX

I desire to quote from an address delivered by the late Sir John Aird, who was president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, at the annual meeting of shareholders, held at Toronto, Canada, January 14, 1936, according to the text of his speech which I received from him:

It is now quite generally agreed that continuous borrowing to It is now quite generally agreed that continuous borrowing to cover deficits and to maintain social services on the present scale cannot go on indefinitely, and therefore that the most rigid public economy and higher taxation must be faced. Intensive study should be given to the problem of establishing a broader and more equitable basis of taxation. In this connection I again advocate a Nation-wide turn-over tax as more likely than any other new form of levy to meet the need for a balanced Budget.

MORGENTHAU RECOMMENDS TURN-OVER TAX OR TRANSACTIONS TAX

Three years ago there appeared in the Washington, D. C., press the statement that Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau had submitted several alternative tax proposals to President Roosevelt and among them a "11/2-percent turnover tax." I suggested to the Ways and Means Committee that they call and question Secretary Morgenthau in regard to this type of taxation but understand that they failed to do so.

JAMES BRYCE-THE HAWAIIAN TAX SYSTEM

Many years ago when James Bryce was Ambassador from England in Washington, he said:

The American form of Government will go on and live long The American form of Government will go on and live long after most of the other forms of government will have fallen or been changed, and the reason is this: In other nations of the world when a new problem comes up it must be tested in a national laboratory, and a solution of the problem must be worked out, and when it is worked out that solution must be applied to the Nation as a whole. Sometimes it may be the correct solution and other times it may be the wrong solution. But you in the United States have 48 laboratories and when new problems arise you can work out 48 different solutions to meet the problem. Out you can work out 48 different solutions to meet the problem. Out of these 48 experimental laboratories, some of the solutions may not prove sound or acceptable, but out of this experimentation history shows you have found at least some remedies which can be made so successful that they will become national in their

This thought-provoking statement by James Bryce, who wrote the monumental work, the American Commonwealth, still considered to be one of the finest treatises ever written on our Government, is absolutely correct. We have recent verification and corroboration of that fact in what has transpired in one of our Territories, the Hawaiian Islands, in regard to their successful experiment in taxation.

I desire to read into the RECORD the following letter which I received from Hon. William Borthwick, tax commissioner of Hawaii:

TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
BUREAU OF THE TAX COMMISSIONER, April 21, 1938.

Hon. MARTIN F. SMITH, M. C.,

1034 New House Office Building, Washington, D. C.
Dear Sir: In reply to your question as to why a gross income tax, rather than a transaction tax, I will say that there are few human activities that could not be described as a transaction. Many of them would produce no income. A law attempting to define transactions would require so many exemptions, deductions, etc., that it would be impossible to administer it without great trouble. For instance, a man buying postage stamps is a transaction that does not produce any income. A man could swap a hound pup for a gallon of moonshine liquor, which would be a transaction.

The reason we adhere to gross income is to find out the gross take in any line of work without looking at the number of transactions. It was suggested at the time I was fighting to put over the gross-income tax that we make it a transaction tax. This I refused to do. The gross-income tax here is the most equitable tax that we have, and those who bitterly assailed it and declared it would put them out of business are now its most ardent sup-

Pardon me for the suggestion, but I believe a little study will reveal that I am right when I tell you that if we had a gross-income tax as a Federal measure, carrying a rate of 2 percent, the money to be spent monthly in the United States in some useful and constructive manner, we could forthwith quit borrowing money and the Federal Government would soon balance its Budget and be run on an even keel.

While I recognize that all of our national borrowings have probably been necessary and are truly only capital investments, a business firm that could get its hands on money by collecting which was due rather than borrowing would certainly succeed in a greater measure than a firm who borrowed money continually, involving them in interest payments.

Before the gross-income-tax law was passed the Territorial legislature appropriated a quarter of a million dollars for each bienrium with which to pay interest on its borrowings to finance the Territorial government through lean periods of collection. Since the gross-income-tax law began operating we have always had money in the till and have never borrowed a thin dime, although the cost of government has increased several million dollars in that

Thank you for your inquiry. Assuring you of any help I may be able to render you in the future, I am, Sincerely yours,

WM. BORTHWICK, Tax Commissioner.

The Hawaiian gross income-tax system has been favored by Dr. Francis E. Townsend since he went to the islands last year, and he brought Hon. Louis C. Silva, official tax expert in the islands, to this country to make an exhaustive study of the proposed tax for the United States. Mr. Silva has been granted a year's leave of absence from his official duties as chief deputy tax administrator for the Territory of Hawaii in order to conduct this survey and investigation. He testified before the Ways and Means Committee, and I quote from his testimony:

This law became effective July 1, 1935. Prior to its enactment, Hawaii faced a deficit of approximately $1,000,000 for the biennium ending June 30, 1935. Salaries and wages of all government employees had already been cut 10 percent, with the prospect of an additional cut just around the corner. The automatic salary increases under Territorial law had been terminated by act of the previous legislature and the functions of government parent to the previous legislature and the functions of government pared to the bone.

bone. In the parlance of Territorial finance, these items presented a very serious problem, indeed, as the amount of revenues required to wipe out the impending deficit, reinstate the 10 percent salary cut, and automatic increases totaled $2,100,000 during the ensuing biennium ending June 30, 1937.

Because of the acute economic situation in Hawaii during the 1933-35 biennium, expenditures had been curtailed to the extent that governmental activities could no longer properly function. Additional revenues were therefore needed during the ensuing biennium to place these activities upon a sound and businesslike basis. This required an additional $3,000,000.

To cope with this serious situation the Honorable Joseph Boyd

To cope with this serious situation the Honorable Joseph Boyd Poindexter, Governor of Hawaii, created an advisory committee on Poindexter, Governor of Hawaii, created an advisory committee on taxation composed of 13 men representing a cross section of the financial, industrial, agricultural, and business life of the islands. This committee was headed by our present tax commissioner, William Borthwick, as chairman. It was charged with the duty of conducting a thorough study of the Territory's tax structure and consistent with its findings, to offer recommendations for the elimination of any current or future financial ills found therein. The Governor's advisory committee on taxation employed me as their statistician, with instructions to conduct for them a research and study of all the so-called emergency tax laws throughout the United States at that time.

out the United States at that time.

Upon completion of a year of diligent effort, this committee submitted a very comprehensive report to the Governor recommending, among other things, that a gross income-tax law be substituted for the business excise tax, which was then upon the statute books. It had been ascertained that the break-down and complete failure of this tax to produce sufficient revenues was directly responsible for Hawaii's financial difficulties.

Although the business excise tax law was also a tax upon the privilege of doing business, the method of measuring the tax was different than that of the present gross-income tax. Under the former act, cost of goods, together with interest and rents paid, were deductible items. Investigation revealed that where merchandise was purchased from foreign countries such returns showed a very narrow margin of taxable income, and in these instances the taxpayers demonstrated losses each year for the purposes of a net income tax and accordingly paid no taxes to the Territory.

It was ascertained that such taxpayers in Hawaii had buying the Territory.

It was ascertained that such taxpayers in Hawaii had buying agents, so-called, in such foreign countries, and when the merchandise was invoiced the Hawaiian purchasers, the margin of profit had already been deducted and added to the cost of the goods. Because of the narrow margin remaining between their gross profit and net profit, it was then a simple matter to demonstrate a net loss after deduction of overhead and operating expenses. This procedure of demonstrating a net loss each year seemed to have no bearing whatever upon their status as going businesses. They had done it for years and anticipated doing it for years to come. The enactment of the gross income tax law, however, dissipated this system with one fell swoop, as the cost of goods is not an allowable deduction under this act. The foregoing, incidentally, constitutes one of the best reasons why the gross income tax law met with such terrific opposition before its enactment. its enactment ..

its enactment.

In his message to the 1935 session of the Hawaiian Legislature, Governor Poindexter unqualifiedly recommended the passage of the gross-income tax as submitted by his advisory committee on taxation, promising that august body that the enactment of such a tax would be the means of not only wiping out the impending deficit, but reinstating the 10 percent salary cuts and automatic increases; employing additional help necessary to improve upon governmental functions, and last, but by no means least, balancing the hudget ancing the budget.

ancing the budget.

Before enactment of the law, however, the Territorial legislature held public hearings upon the bill, giving all an opportunity to be heard. It developed that most of the businessmen and more particularly the retail merchants were against the enactment of such a law, claiming, among other things, that a rate of 1½ percent upon their sales would drive them to the wall.

One group of retail merchants and taxpayers formed a very powerful lobby for the express purpose of fighting its enactment.

When the retailers and others realized that they were losing ground and the bill seemed certain of enactment, they tried to have the law amended so that it would be made mandatory to pass the tax on to the customer. In this they were unsuccessful, and Hawaii's law today does not include such a provision.

The honest retailers, and there were many of these who strenucusly fought the enactment of the bill, did not know then what the gross income tax law held in store for them.

They did not realize that where there were only 5,600 honest taxpayers carrying a certain burden of taxation, that under the gross income tax law 26,000 or 364 percent more taxpayers were going to help them bear this same load.

In order to better demonstrate the value of broadening a tax base such as demonstrated above, let us say, for example, that the Territory of Hawaii required that the former business excise tax collect $2,600,000 in revenues in 1 year. If 5,600 taxpayers were to pay this, then each taxpayer would be called upon to pay an average of $464 per annum in taxes, whereas under the pres-were to pay this, then each taxpayer would be called upon to pay an average of $464 per annum in taxes, whereas under the present gross income tax law, with its broadened base of 26,000 taxpayers, each taxpayer would pay an average on only $100 per annum. Many folks ask the very reasonable question as to whether or not the tax has caused a rise in prices. I can truthfully say that in Hawaii the rise, if any, has gone unnoticed. Of course, there are two sound reasons which may be given for this. One is the fact that the gross-income tax replaced another law, and the other and most important reason is that the base of taxation was broadened 364 percent.

It hardly need be said that the formidable opposition demonstrated the said that the formidable opposition demonstrates the said that the said that the formidable opposition demonstrates the said that the said it hardly need be said that the formidable opposition demonstrated before the law was enacted has since been entirely dissipated insofar as the honest taxpayer is concerned. A small amount of opposition by certain people still persists, but we know that these grumblings emanate from taxpayers who constitute the greater part of the 364-percent increase group, and the sympathy we have conveyed to them has been very conspicuous by its absence.

Hawait's gross income tax law was designed to raise $5,108,600 during the first blennium ending June 30, 1937. The higher rate of 1½ percent was made flexible to the extent that should insufficient revenues be collected, the Governor was authorized to raise it to a maximum of 1½ percent, and should more funds than were necessary be collected, he was empowered to lower this higher rate accordingly and without limit.

From its inception, however, the revenues collected were so great that during the last 6-month period of the first biennium, Governor Poindexter lowered the higher rate of 1½ percent to Governor Poindexter lowered the higher rate of 1½ percent to 1 percent.

Even though this rate was cut 20 percent, the gross income tax collected $1,331,303.85, or 25.06 percent more than was required of it. Had the higher rate remained at 1½ percent throughout the biennium, this tax would have collected $1,654,022.98, or 32.38 percent more than was required. The Territory not only balanced its budget at the end of the biennium as predicted by the Governor, but presented the legislature with a surplus of $1,315,000.

The following increase in business done and gross income reflected during the year 1937 as against 1936 may be of interest to you. Retailing increased 16 percent; producing, wholesaling, and certain manufacturing, 8.7 percent; printing and publishing, 23.5 percent; services other than professional, 20 percent; professional services, 25.8 percent; contracting, 30.8 percent; theaters and amusements, 14.6 percent; interest and discounts received, 1.6 percent; and all other taxable gross income, 5.2 percent. The base of the tax for all classifications increased 10.2 percent in 1937 over 1936. the tax for all classifications increased 10.2 percent in 1937 over 1936.

the tax for all classifications increased 10.2 percent in 1937 over 1936. You may readily observe from the above break-down of business activities such as retailing, sugar processing, and pineapple canning, printing and publishing, contracting, theaters and amusements, and others which serve as reliable yardsticks, how much more simple it is for Hawaii to accurately gage its trends of business. It is safe to say, however, that the actual business done in the Territory did not increase to the extent demonstrated, and it is even safer to say that business was not paying additional taxes because they particularly liked the gross income tax law. We fully realize that because of the chiseling which prevailed in the past and which cannot now so easily escape the provisions and administration of a gross income tax law, that total business for a time will show increases, whereas actually business may be falling off. The saturation point must first be reached before for a time will show increases, whereas actuary business may be falling off. The saturation point must first be reached before these statistics become of real value, but thereafter they may be used as unquestionable yardsticks for the measurement of business trends.

Reference has been made to a higher rate of 1½ percent. This is because of the fact that under Hawaii's law certain business is because of the fact that under Hawaii's law certain business activities bear various rates of tax, as follows: The business activities of producing, wholesaling, or jobbing and certain manufacturing bear a rate of one-quarter of 1 percent; printing and publishing pays 1 percent; professional services, one-half of 1 percent; retailing, sugar processing and pineapple canning, services other than professional contracting, theaters and amusements, interest, commissions, rentals, and all other taxable gross income, 14 percent.

Based upon the taxable gross receipts reported by all classifications under this law, the average rate of tax for the year 1936 was a fraction over nine-tenths of 1 percent.

The 1937 session of the Hawaiian Legislature made gross income the "budget-balancing tax law." In order to balance the 1937–39 the "budget-balancing tax law." In order to balance the 1937-39 budget the gross-income tax was required to collect $7.829,919.54, which was $2,721,319.54, or 53.28 percent, more than was required of it during the previous biennium. From all present indications, this is being accomplished even though the business activities of sugar processing and pineapple canning have been very hard hit because of lower world prices for their products. Any conditions which adversely affect these two industries are soon reflected against other business activities.

It seems significant to state that the original higher rate of 1½ percent would today be lowered to approximately three-fourths of 1 percent based upon the same revenue requirement for the 1935–37 biennium. Hawaii is today collecting 53 percent more revenue under its gross income tax law than was required during the 1935–37 biennium, and this is being done at the same rates which prevailed during that biennium.

The tremendous increase in collections under this law is inverse.

The tremendous increase in collections under this law is invaria-The tremendous increase in collections under this law is invariably credited to the increase in business done throughout the Territory. Inquiries, however, prove otherwise, and the honest merchants in Hawaii are still at a loss to know how the gross-income tax is able to increase its collections to such an extent when their own sales have actually fallen off. One of the answers to this is the broadening of the base for purposes of taxation, which automatically makes the payment of a tax more equitable.

Hawaii's experience depresentates guits completely that also Hawaii's experience demonstrates quite conclusively that dishonest taxpayers at heart are truly in the minority. Because of the victous competition created by dishonest taxpayers in underselling their honest competitors, the latter group have been forced to conform or go out of business. If their own government neglects to protect them as honest merchants and taxpayers, then they have no other recourse if they are to survive.

they have no other recourse if they are to survive.

Our system of compiling statistical data in Hawaii places us in such a position that we know at all times how business is faring. such a position that we know at all times how business is faring. We have compiled statistical charts covering 350 kinds of business, with a supporting break-down showing how much retail business was done during any specified period of time, how much whole-saling, how much manufacturing, and so forth. These charts tell us the source of the tax, in other words, the particular kind of business endeavor in which the taxpayer is engaged, the number of taxpayers engaged in such business, and the several business activities by which the gross income was received.

We know, for example, that there are 30 sugar-processing companies engaged in business in Hawaii, and we also know how much income was received from the processing of sugar how much was income was received from the processing of sugar, how much was received from retail business done, the amount received from the business activities of theaters and amusements, services rendered, interest received, commissions received, rentals received, and so

Since its inception the gross income tax division in Hawaii has been the business barometer for the Territory. There is no guess-work there, and no estimating upon business already done is necwork there, and no estimating upon business already done is necessary, as our method of compiling statistics must balance to the penny with collections. Because of this system we are also able to anticipate with a substantial degree of accuracy the possibilities of future business income and taxes thereon.

Based upon statistical data for the year 1937, the cost of administering Hawaii's gross income tax law is 1.43 percent of collections. The annual average cost per taxpayer is approximately $2.02, and the average monthly cost per return filed a little less than 17 cents. The average tax collection per taxpayer was $141.37.

A very pertinent feature of Hawaii's law is the fact that the tax

A very pertinent feature of Hawaii's law is the fact that the tax is paid monthly. The taxpayers there seem to be very pleased with this phase of it and more particularly the smaller taxpayers who find it difficult to raise sufficient funds to meet their taxes if same were paid annually or even semiannually. This monthly payment feature has been a factor also in keeping delinquencies and ultimate losses down to about one one-thousandth of 1 percent of collections. cent of collections.

Prior to the enactment of the law it was necessary for the Terri-Prior to the enactment of the law it was necessary for the Territory to borrow from local banks to carry on the functions of government and after a time borrowing power became somewhat strained. Interest paid upon such borrowings was quite substantial, amounting to $145,326.48 during the 1933-35 biennium. Since the inception of the act, however, it has not been necessary to borrow a single penny from the banks, as the tax is payable monthly and the Territory of Hawaii has always had more than sufficient funds with which to carry on.

NATIONAL GROSS BUSINESS TURN-OVER-INCOME-REVENUE

Nobody knows to a certainty what the present national gross business turn-over and total business transactions amount to but Dr. E. A. Goldenweiser, Director of Research and Statistics of the Board of Governor of the Federal Reserve System, who is probably in a better position to make a reliable estimate than anybody else in the country, has estimated the total for 1938 at $553,000,000,000. Dr. Robert R. Nathan, chief economist for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, has estimated the gross revenue and income of the Nation for 1936, the last year for which the figures have been compiled and are available in his office, at $449,000,000,000. From these estimates which both authorities declare to be conservative, Mr. Louis C. Silva, deputy tax commissioner of the Hawaiian Islands, our tax expert, has made a further deduction to be on the safe side and remove all grounds for any argument by our opposition that we are inflating our figures and further making a very liberal allowance for all exemptions, and has placed his estimate of the present national gross taxable income under this bill at $360,000,000,000. Mr. Silva estimates that one-third of this sum can be figured as derived from producers, manufacturers, wholesalers, and jobbers, or $120,000,000,000 subject to a tax of one-half of 1 percent and yielding $600,000,000 per year. This would leave the remaining two-thirds, or $240,000,000,000 for all retail transactions, business and professional activities of all kinds, subject to the 2-percent tax with an annual yield of $4,800,-000,000 and a total yield of $5,400,000,000 to be divided among 8,000,000 pensioners of the age of 60 and past and amounting to $56.25 per month for the first year and, of course, certain to increase commensurate with the increase in money circulation, velocity, and turn-over and consequent increase in gross business turn-over and business transactions.

THE NEED OF INCREASING THE VELOCITY OF MONEY

Dr. Goldenweiser has on more than one occasion stressed the fact that the decrease in national business transactions is largely due to "decline in velocity." He pointed out in a recent statement that in 1929, when bank deposits were less and when the amount of currency outside of the banks was about $2,000,000,000 less than at the present time, that there was double the volume of business transacted in the country as compared to 1938. This was due to the fact that each dollar in demand deposits turned over 26½ times during the year 1929, whereas it turned over 13 times during 1938, which does not include the turn-over of currency, the figures for which are not available and which would probably be greater.

In other words, one of our difficulties today is the lack of money circulation. There is a pressing need of not only putting money in the hands of the masses but it must be kept in circulation, hence H. R. 6466 provides that the pension must be spent within 30 days. The more rapidly it circulates, the greater service—the greater work—it will do for humanity. That is one of the main objectives of the Townsend plan.

ADVANTAGE OF QUICK CASH TURNOVER

In 1935–36 the Supreme Court ordered the Illinois Bell Telephone Co. to refund to subscribers in Chicago the tidy little sum of $20,700,000 overcharges. This money was immediately spent in the stores of Chicago, the merchants passing it along in payment of various bills, and in the purchase of more merchandise, and in just a few days the money had turned over so rapidly and circulated from person to person so often that it had transacted approximately $100,000,000 worth of new business, and even in the big wealthy city of Chicago, which deals in billions, it attracted attention and surprise.

According to the Dow-Jones Co., of New York, national authority as statisticians and economists, this Chicago money turned over 22½ times during the year, which meant that this $20,700,000 created $465,750,000 worth of new business If the comparatively small sum of $20,700,000 disbursed by a private corporation to a few people created $465,750,000 worth of new business for Chicago merchants alone, then why will not $5,500,000,000 disbursed by the Government to 8,000,000 citizens also turn over 22½ times and produce $121,000,000,000 worth of new business for all the merchants of America? In other words, increase the volume of gross business turnover to that extent, or does the money of a private corporation act any differently than money disbursed by the Government?

EXAMPLE OF $10 TURNOVER

For example, taking the month of April as a basis, to show possible and reasonable transactions with a Government $10 check from his allowance, we find the pensioner receives a check on April 1 and takes $10 of it the same day to his grocer, who pays 2 percent to the Government on sales; the grocer pays same check to his clerk, who also pays 2 percent on salary (all over $100 per month); the clerk pays check to butcher, who also pays the Government 2 percent on sales; on the 2d, butcher pays to wholesaler, who also pays 2 percent on sales; wholesaler pays to his clothier, who also pays to the Government on sales; clothier pays same check to salesman on 6th; salesman pays it to his grocer on 8th; grocer pays to his wholesaler on 10th; wholesaler pays to his salesman on 10th; salesman pays on his auto on 11th; auto dealer pays to his salesman on 13th; salesman pays to his landlord on 15th; landlord pays to electric company on 16th; electric company pays to employee on 20th at noon; employee pays to drygoods company same afternoon; drygoods company pays salesman same check on closing on 20th; salesman pays his grocery bill on 22d; grocery pays on daily account to bakery on 23d; bakery pays daily account to creamery on 24th; creamery pays wholesaler on 25th; wholesaler pays on furniture the 26th; furniture dealer pays his salesman on 27th; salesman pays on his radio the 27th; radio dealer pays to his wholesaler on 29th, saving his 2 percent cash discount for month; and the wholesaler deposits check in bank on the 30th. Each transaction has paid a 2percent tax, amounting to 20 cents, either from seller of merchandise or receiver of check for services.

Twenty-five reasonable and not unusual accounts have been paid with this one $10 check, which is accepted by everybody the same as currency, and 25 payments have earned $5 in revenue tax. This shows the possibility of velocity in business.

With this possible with one $10 check, what would happen with 8,000,000 pensioners paying out from $56.25 to $200 per month on the Townsend plan, and everybody keeping up this velocity of business transactions?

An interesting experiment was made, as related by Frederic J. Haskin, of the Washington (D. C.) Star, in his article entitled "The Velocity of Money Circulation." As a feature of a convention held in Milwaukee, Wis., the chamber of commerce put in circulation $400 in money so marked that it could be traced. The tracing could be carried on indefinitely until the money actually wore out or returned to the Treasury or to Federal Reserve banks for redemption and destruction. But in the short time that the chamber traced the money—a matter of a few days only—it was found that $400 paid bills amounting to $1,425. That much indebtedness was discharged by the original $400.

While a certain amount of cooperation from local people was required to keep track of the use of the money, no collusion was involved and, in all probability, many transactions were missed entirely; that is, probably more debts were paid than could be traced.

WHERE THE MONEY WENT

In detail, the fascinating story is as follows: Three hundred dollars of the money paid salaries to various persons. Meals—dinner, luncheons accounted for $258. Landlords received $136 of the $400, while $109 was expended for groceries. The sum of $78 was spent for general merchandise, while hotel bills to the extent of only $48 were paid. In view of the fact that a convention was in the city at the time the experiment was conducted, it appears that comparatively little of the original $400 got into the hands of the visitors as hotel bills doubtless constituted a major portion of their expenses. Home-town people were getting the chief use of the funds.

Banks received $38 of the identifiable money on deposit, while board bills were paid with $35. Filling-station men received a respectable share, for $35 came into their hands in payment for gasoline and oil. Housewives paid $34 of the money for meats, while coal and other fuel bills were paid to the extent of $31. Twenty-nine dollars went into the hands of public-utility companies in settlement of electric bills, with another $10 for water and gas bills.

Cigars, cigarettes, and tobacco were purchased with $24 of the money, while candy, ice cream, and similar light refreshments accounted for $20. Transportation fares locally, streetcars, busses, and taxicabs absorbed $15. Debts were paid and loans made to the extent of $18, while tips accounted for $17.

Furniture and hardware stores got $17 of the money and $15 of it was paid on medical and dental bills. Insurance premiums were paid to the extent of $15. Movies and other theaters and amusements accounted for $15 of the original money.

Barbers and proprietors of beauty shops received $14 of this money, while $13 was expended for drugs and medicines. Club dues and charitable donations accounted for $10. Nine dollars went for flowers and jewelry.

Bakers took in $9 of the money, and $9 of it was spent for shoes. Garage bills were paid to the extent of $8, while tailors, cleaners, and laundries got $8. Telephone bills were paid in the amount of $6, while radio tubes and accessories were purchased with $5.

Shoe shines and shoe repairs were acquired with the payment of $5 of the marked money. Railways and boat tickets accounted for $5, and another $5 turned up as payment of interest on a note. Payment on an automobile in the sum of $4 of this money was made. Livestock was purchased with $1.

Thus the total of $1,425 was reached. Money, to be of any use, must continue to circulate, and theoretically there are no limits to the extent of this circulation, as the Milwaukee test shows.

Starting with the $300 out of the original $400 which was paid in salaries, it can be assumed that some of it was paid in rent. The test showed that $258 of the money was paid in rent, but that did not necessarily all come out of salary money. But to follow through one single line: Assume the landlord used some of the rent money he received to pay his grocery bill. Then assume that the grocer paid his electric-light bill with what he had received. The electric-light company owed a bill for fuel and paid over some of the money to discharge that debt. The coal man paid some to the hardware man for shovels. The hardware man paid a doctor's bill, and the doctor bought flowers and had a suit pressed.

Only about 3 days were devoted to the Milwaukee experiment, and yet it was shown that $400 paid $1,425 in bills. Those obligations were definitely and finally discharged; they did not have to be paid again; and yet no more money was used. That is the whole theory of circulation and, in part, the theory of inflation. Practically everyone in the United States is in debt. With more money in circulation and hoarding stopped the cycle of payments can be speeded up, and in a short time the obligations can be discharged.

A transaction tax of 2 percent on every retail transaction, sale, barter, or exchange is the most equitable and just form of tax that could possibly be devised, and it would not work a hardship or injury on anybody. It would amount to $2 on every $100, $20 on every $1,000, $2,000 on every $100,000, and so forth; and in the case of nearly all manufactured wares, goods, and merchandise would involve directly a tax load of only five times the single 2 percent while passing, first, through the hands of the producers of the raw material; second, the manufacturer of the raw material; third, the jobber-broker-commission man; fourth, the wholesaler; and, fifth, the retailer.

It was estimated at the previous social-security hearings (p. 1103) that the cost of living would rise by 10 to 12 percent, and even the group of University of Chicago professors who oppose the Townsend plan on other grounds stated in the pamphlet issued by them that—an examination of statistics for one or two representative industries (not included in this pamphlet for lack of space) confirms the reasonableness of the estimate that the rise would be on the order of 10 percent.

However, if the increase in the price level proved greater, owing to the stimulation of business, trade, industry, and agriculture, which would result, it would be governed by the law of supply and demand, the same as in the past and at the present time. Prices would go up and wages go up in proportion. Hence, no damage or injury could be caused to the vendor of any commodity who would, in the very nature of things, be greatly benefited on account of the improved market and demand for everything that is produced on the farms and manufactured in the factories.

THE TRANSACTION TAX-GROSS SALES

A transaction or gross-sales or gross-revenue tax is a tax on business transactions. It is not a tax on profits. To illustrate: During 1933 and 1934 the United States Government collected a tax of 2 cents on each bank check. This was a transaction tax applied to check transactions only. The tax was 2 cents on a $1 check and only 2 cents on a $1,000 check. The small bank depositor paid the major portion of this tax.

The United States Treasury, during 1933 and 1934, collected from this tax over $79,000,000, according to the Secretary of the Treasury. During these years the Federal Reserve Board reported that its branches and agencies alone handled over $76,000,000,000 worth of checks. To further illustrate: If the tax had been 2 percent of the total check transactions, instead of 2 cents on each check, the Government would have collected from Federal Reserve agencies alone over $1,500,000,000 instead of a total of only $79,000,000.

To further illustrate: All the corporations in the United States paid income taxes in 1934 of $397,000,000. The users of tobacco alone—chewing, cigars, and cigarettes—paid a total tax into the United States Treasury in the same year of $425,000,000.

NATIONAL INCOME VERSUS NATIONAL BUSINESS TURN-OVER

Some people fail to differentiate between national income and national business turn-over. They confuse the two and assume that the pension payments must be deducted from the present national income and without any increase of the latter. They confine the volume of the Nation's business to the national income and consequently place themselves in the position of claiming that every time a dollar of national income is spent that dollar ceases to exist; that it stops right then and there and can never be spent again. No other conclusion can logically follow, for they can point to no year in which the amount of business transacted in the United States did not exceed many, many times over the amount of national income. The national cash income in 1929 was $81,000,000,000. The national business turn-over for the same year was $1,200,000,000,000.

A manufacturer may do a gross business turn-over of $1,000,000 and have an income of $100,000. Another manufacturer may do a business of $10,000,000 and have an income of only $10,000. The tax is not based on income or profits, but upon the gross volume of all business transacted.

The cigarette tax is not based on the profits or income of the cigarette manufacturer; it is based on the volume of cigarettes manufactured. The gasoline tax is not based on the income or profits of those engaged in selling gasoline; it is based on the volume of gasoline sold. Likewise, the transaction tax is not based on the net cash national income, it is based on the volume of all business transacted—measured in dollars—hence it is called a transaction or gross-sales, gross-revenue, or gross-income tax.

To illustrate further: If a small merchant did a $50,000 business at a net profit of $5,000 in 1935; then, because of increase in sales because of the Townsend plan going into effect, he did a $100,000 business in 1938 at a $10,000 profit, the Government would collect 2 percent of the $100,000, or $2,000, leaving a net profit for 1938 of $8,000 as against only $5,000 in 1935. Thus, by paying $2,000 tax to support the Townsend prosperity plan, the merchant increased his business and profit. And his income was not taken or taxed to support the Townsend plan.

PENSIONS WILL NOT BE PAID FROM PRESENT NATIONAL INCOME

The fallacy most often used against the Townsend plan is the statement that the monthly pensions will be paid from the present national income.

Economists know full well that money of itself has no value whatever; that it simply is a symbol used in registering the amount of labor or goods involved in a transaction. I know little about poker and never play poker but know enough about the game to know that each poker chip on a gambling table simply represents something, and that something in that case is a definite amount of currency, which is no more than a due bill on the world for something. There may be only 500 chips on the table, yet any amount of winnings, from $1 to $10,000, may change hands in one evening, passing those chips back and forth in the process.

Russell Leffingwell, of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co.,

recently declared:

Money is not an end to itself, it is a means to an end.

Henry Ford, in the American Magazine, October 1934, said:

The function of money is not to make money but to buy goods. Money is only one part of our transportation system. It moves goods from man to man. A dollar bill is like a postage stamp, it is no good unless it will move commodities between persons. If a postage stamp will not carry a letter, or money will not move goods, it is just the same as an engine that will not run. Someone will have to get out and fix it.

The records show that our national income has increased in the face of increased taxes; or, putting it the other way, increase in taxes does not decrease the national income.

The administration levied a processing tax on farm commodities, better known as the A. A. A. tax. It was a transaction tax on processing. This tax exceeded over a billion dollars before it was nullified by the Supreme Court. Who paid this tax? The highest authorities are in disagreement. Some say the farmers paid it, some say the processors, and others say the consumers paid it. But that is beside the point.

The point is that in the face of this new billion dollar transaction tax, collected by the Federal Government, the farmers' income increased, the railroad income increased; business income increased; deposits increased in banks, and the national income increased.

So much for the claim that the Townsend plan pensions being paid out of national income—or "involving one-half of the national income."

Walter E. Spahr, of New York University, in a radio address said:

Thus to pay the annual cost of the Townsend pension scheme would require 40 percent of the national income.

This, of course, is untrue. The Townsend plan will not "rob Peter to pay Paul," which is another oft-repeated statement made by opponents of the plan.

A man without income in 1935 may in 1939 invest his money, or credit, employ idle men, buy unused raw products, turn out new goods, and sell the new goods thus produced to men heretofore unemployed. Thus taxes can be paid, idle men employed, business and freight receipts increased, and a profit made in addition without taking a single penny from the present "national income" or from any person now employed.

It is, therefore, possible to increase taxes, increase freight income to railroads, increase pay rolls, increase the buying of life insurance, increase medical and dental service, increase the consumption and production of food, clothing, and luxuries—and increase the expenses of operating and building bigger and better mills and factories—without taking anything from those who now have property or from those now employed.

This is possible because we have unused materials, unused money and credit, idle men and idle machinery. These will create new wealth without taking wealth or income from others.

CONCLUSION—RECAPITULATION

This legislation will relieve industry and business and the employer of the pay-roll tax, and the States of their parity contributions to the present Social Security fund, and spread the cost over the entire population at a rate so small that it will not be burdensome or work a hardship upon anybody. It requires no payment of interest to the bankers. It is a cash-and-carry, pay-as-you-go, self-financing, self-liquidating plan, and far less costly than a bond-debt-creating system, with its appalling interest burden. It applies the velocity principle of money turn-over and provides a revolving fund, upon a pay-as-you-go basis, to create active, liquid, working capital, available currently every month of the year, to finance the idle, unused potential productive capacity of our industrial and agricultural facilities. The old-age assistance phase of H. R. 6466 (H. R. 2) is merely the most desirable means to the more important end sought, namely, the acceleration of the velocity of money turn-over. The pensions to the aged, the most deserving group of our population. to be expended currently each month in the purchase of goods and services, is merely the modus operandi by which the working capital is made available to the productive enterprise of the Nation. The bill H. R. 6466 (H. R. 2) is the only proposal pending before Congress which will meet the requirements of the price system, the profit motive, and credit capitalism. There is not a single sound, valid objection against it and it should and will become the law of [Applause.] the land.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEENEY].

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time allotted to me I shall not make a detailed statement of my espousal of this legislation, preferring to let the testimony I gave before the Ways and Means Committee in behalf of H. R. 2 stand as an argument in favor of this present bill. In my opinion, there is very little difference except the tax structure, which has been changed at the suggestion of the leaders in the Townsend organization.

I do, however, desire to meet the charges made on the floor of the House today by several Members against Dr. Francis Townsend, not direct charges but inferences proclaiming Dr. Townsend to be the head of a racket organization, handling large sums of money for which no accounting is made, and collecting dues from the poor people who are members of his organization.

I challenge any Member of this House to point out one single instance since he became the head of the Townsend movement wherein Dr. Townsend was guilty of turpitude of any kind, malfeasance, or misfeasance in the administration of the affairs of this powerful organization.

I have been an advocate of the Townsend philosophy since its inception, and if I thought Dr. Francis Townsend was guilty of any of the charges made by inference here today I would sever my support and connection with this Nation-wide movement. The membership of the Townsend organization represents substantial citizens. If they desire to contribute 10 cents or $1 a year toward the maintenance of their organization, that is their business, and not the concern of the Congress of the United States.

Those of you who were here as Members of the Congress when Dr. Townsend walked out of the congressional committee room, and subsequently was charged with contempt, will admit that the so-called investigating committee was a political inquisition committee, designed to cast aspersions upon a movement which had great potential political strength. At that famous hearing when Dr. Townsend departed from the committee room he was refused the right to submit a statement, a right which is usually accorded to any witness appearing before congressional committees, a right that was most generously accorded to the great J. Pierpont Morgan when he appeared before a certain committee of the United States Senate a few months previous.

The effect of Dr. Townsend's conviction and subsequentpardon by the President of the United States demonstrated that the Chief Executive at least believed in his sincerity, and I believe that goes for almost the entire press of the Nation, who, while in many instances they criticized the Townsend philosophy, were unanimous in their opinion that its leader was a sincere individual.

While the measure before us today in some respects is a substantial departure from the legislation heretofore introduced on this subject, it is in its last analysis the Townsend plan, a plan that has swept the country like wildfire, and which I believe will be the cause of bringing about an adequate, substantial old-age pension throughout the Nation. I have been identified with this movement for the past 5 years. It has been my privilege to address large gatherings of American citizens interested in the subject of old-age pension. I have been honored by having the privilege of addressing two national conventions of the Townsend organization.

Whenever and wherever I was privileged to speak in behalf of old-age security I proclaimed that the $200 per month was somewhat of a myth, but that the Townsend plan would justify its existence if legislation would be enacted assuring an annuity of $50 or more per month to qualified annuitants. From a conservative estimate made by the experts who have fixed the proposed tax rate specified in H. R. 6466, the annuity would mean, roughly, about $57 a month.

This bill, perhaps, will not pass at this session of Congress, but tomorrow the day of reckoning is at hand. The advocates of this legislation have a right to know their friends and their opponents. A "yes" or "no" vote will determine this question tomorrow under the rules which guide the consideration of this measure.

For the reasons advanced, despite the charge of demogogy, I have never swerved in my conviction nor apologized for my membership in the organization nor my advocacy for this sort of legislation. It was my good fortune to pioneer in the field of old-age pension in the State of Ohio some 20 years ago, and my interest in the subject has not abated but, on the contrary, has increased with the advance of consideration of the Townsend plan.

It took 12 years before the opponents of national prohibition were given consideration by the Congress of the United States. During my 8 years as a Member of Congress the payment of the adjusted-service certificates, or the bonus bill, was under deliberation three times before the measure finally became a law. I am firmly convinced as I stand here today that the next Congress, or the one to follow, will ultimately enact into law a similar measure to the one we discussed today, and that those of us who support this bill will have made a splendid contribution toward hastening the day when substantial old-age pensions will be paid to those who have given the best years of their lives in the interest of their Government and society as a whole.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER].

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, the time allotted me is short. I rise to support this bill. Some have said that there will be none to support this measure except those who were elected by the efforts of the Townsend organization. This is one of the many instances where that is not the case. In my district another had that endorsement, and the race was not even close. I received almost 7 votes to my opponent's 1. There must be some other reasons for my support. It is simply this: First, I believe in security for our senior citizens; and, second, I believe that this a good, though perhaps not a perfect, bill. No one has claimed perfection for any measure that has been before this House this

A TRUE STORY

Let me tell you a true story in illustrating my support of this legislation that we now have before us. This is a story in which I played an important part, a story having to do with farm life, a story that has been enacted in similar form on nearly every farm in the United States. I apologize for the continued use of the first person, but I can see no other effective way of giving it to you.

DECK AND DELL

I was reared on a farm in the Middle West. Every year we raised on this farm many acres of wheat. In those days there were no combines and no tractors. The grain must be cut and bound into bundles with what was known as a grain binder. It took five horses to draw this implement over the field. Round and round it went from early morning until late at night. The three horses hitched in the rear were driven by my father and one of the two in the lead was ridden by myself to keep them from tramping underfoot the precious golden grain.

On the day of my story it was extra hot-not a breath of air was stirring. To the sultriness of the atmosphere was added the odor of the perspiring animals. All this made breathing almost impossible. I was very fond of the horse I was riding, for we had taken many a gallop over the hills of the surrounding country. As we went around the field and as he began to lather and his breath came almost in gasps, my heart went out to the dumb animal.

Across the barbed-wire fence from us on one side of the field was a field of clover, knee high, each plant tipped with a crimson bloom. At one end of the clover field, under the shade of an elm tree, stood two fat, sleek horses, head to tail, lazily switching the flies from each other. It seemed almost as long as I could remember that this old team had had the best of everything on the farm. In the winter the warm box stall was theirs. The brightest of hay was placed in their manger and each evening they were bedded knee deep in straw. In the summertime their entire day was spent as I saw them now, with nothing to do but eat and drink and stand in the shade.

I REBEL AT THE WORLD'S INJUSTICE

On this day as I looked across the fence at the old gray team and heard in the nearby woods the voices of my school playmates swimming in my swimming hole or catching my fish while I was denied that pleasure, resentment to the injustices of a cruel world rose in rebellion within my youthful mind. It seemed to me that there was no such thing as justice.' Why must I, all day long from daylight until dark, ride this sweaty horse round and round the field while other boys of my own age, boys with whom I attended school in the nearby village, were at leisure to come into my own domain, on my father's farm and shoot my game and catch my fish, both of which were all too scarce? Then there was the horse I was riding-a spirited animal that, when he was not worked down, could keep pace with the best of horses. But here he was, perspiration dripping from his flanks, tormented by bot flies, nervously throwing his head as they stung him on the throat. This he had been doing for weeks and this he would do for weeks to come, while old Deck and old Dell made no greater effort than was required to move from the shade of the tree into the clover, down to the nearby brook and back again to resume their switching in the shade. The more I reflected on it the greater the rebellion that arose within me.

I ASK FOR JUSTICE

Soon we stopped to "blow" the horses and to get a drink of luke-warm water from the jug wrapped in an old gunny sack that we had hidden from the hot rays of the sun beneath a nearby shock of grain. It was then that, filled with the thoughts of an unjust world, that I exploded with, "Dad, it's not fair. Look at that horse pant. He pulls as much as any other horse and carries a load besides. Let's give the lead team a rest tomorrow and let that fat old team work while this horse and his mate take a turn in the clover. It's no more than right."

I shall never forget the look in my father's eyes nor the tone of his voice as he replied in measured words that seemed to carry with them a solemn promise, "Son, old Deck and old Dell will never look through a collar again. They were a wedding present, along with a farm wagon and a set of harness from my father to your mother and me. Everything we have we owe to that team. The house in which we live, this ground from which we are cutting grain, cleared with so much labor, and even the education of you children, are the result of the efforts of Deck and Dell. If they live for 50 years, the best will be none too good for them. They have earned their keep."

He kept his promise, and the old team spent their last days in peace and plenty in return for services well rendered in their younger days.

My colleagues, this is the way we are treating our dumb brutes. Should the fathers and mothers of the Nation be accorded less favorable treatment? Need I say more? [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Seccombe].

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Chairman, this is not a political question with me, because I rise in support of the bill. I am positive if my mother and dad were living I would be expressing their sentiments.

I was amused at my good friend and colleague from Ohio [Mr. Sweeney] when he said that President Hoover promised one chicken in every pot, because the New Deal promised two chickens in every pot, and today the old people do not even have a pot. [Laughter.]

Several days ago the President made the statement, "Consistency, thou art geography." Certainly geography does not apply to this question known as the Townsend bill, because some thirty or thirty-five million people have endorsed it. They claim it is a good plan, and so do I. I place my sentiments in the hands of Dr. Townsend and the aged people of this fine Government of ours, rather than place my sentiments in the hands of the President, who would rather talk about war in Europe and becoming involved in some foreign entanglements, and to send some mother's son back to a

I am going to support the bill. I am conscientious when I say that, as I pledged myself to support a Federal old-age pension, and I wish to make good my promise. I believe in the principle of this bill, although it may not be perfect in its entirety. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Robsion].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman and colleagues, we have before us for consideration H. R. 6466. The Townsend folks had introduced on the first day of the Seventy-sixth Congress, January 3, 1939, H. R. 2. H. R. 2 is the successor to Townsend bills introduced in the Seventy-fourth and Seventy-fifth Congresses.

H. R. 6466 comes to us under most remarkable circumstances. The Ways and Means Committee of the House, controlled by the Democrats, held hearings on H. R. 2 and other proposals to amend the Social Security Act. Thousands of pages of testimony were taken. Dr. Townsend and all the witnesses he desired to introduce were heard. After this great committee had heard testimony for 3 months or more, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS], a supporter of the Townsend plan, on May 23, 1939, introduced H. R. 6466, and the Ways and Means Committee reported this bill without recommendation on May 25, 2 days later. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton], chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, told us that in all his experience on the Ways and Means Committee it had never made such a report on any bill before.

The Ways and Means Committee is made up of 25 members and among the ablest and most experienced men of the House. I am informed that each and every member of the Ways and Means Committee were and are opposed to the so-called Townsend plan. It is strange indeed that this great committee of experienced men, after hearing testimony for and against this proposal for 3 months, dropped it into the lap of the House without any recommendation. It is generally said that our Democratic friends took this course in order to put the Republicans "on the spot" and force a record vote.

This bill was brought up for consideration under a special gag rule reported out by the Rules Committee made up of 10 Democrats and 4 Republicans. This special rule makes it impossible to change in any particular whatever any of the provisions or terms of this bill. The bill is made up of 29 large printed pages. Each Member of the House must vote on it as is without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i." No Member will have an opportunity to offer or vote for any amendment in order to perfect it and provide a decent and reasonable pension for needy old people. Dr. Townsend and his followers agreed for the Ways and Means Committee to report the bill without recommendation and for the Rules Committee to bring in and adopt this gag rule.

The administration and its leaders knew, and Dr. Townsend and his supporters knew, that the bill could not be passed and become law in its present form. Dr. Townsend gave out more than one statement in recent weeks that the bill would be defeated. Mr. Jeffreys, the active vice president of the Townsend movement, according to the gentleman from Illinois, Congressman DIRKSEN and others, admitted that the bill would not pass, and stated that the Townsend people did not want this bill to pass. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS), who introduced H. R. 6466, told us in his speech today that the bill had no chance to pass, and all others who spoke for the bill said it had no chance to pass. The Townsend plan was turned down by Congress when the socialsecurity bill was up in 1935.

Why do the supporters of the Townsend plan persist in the bill in its present form and urge a gag rule to prevent any perfecting amendments when they know there is no chance for the bill to pass?

I am anxious to do something fair, reasonable, and substantial for the needy old people of this country, and but for this gag rule I think this House would amend this bill so that it could and would pass and would provide a reasonable and fair pension for needy old people. The bill in its present form has the active opposition of the farmers of the Nation, the American Federation of Labor, the railroad brotherhoods, and other labor groups.

Since the Townsend plan has been urged, I have received only four letters and one telegram from the people of my district favoring the Townsend plan and urging me to support it. I have received many letters expressing strong opposition. I have also received hundreds of letters from people in my district favoring an adequate and reasonable old-age pension, but they say they do not expect me to vote for the Townsend plan, as it is unreasonable.

FROM $200 TO $300 PER MONTH

Dr. Townsend testified at great length before the Ways and Means Committee. He and his supporters take the position that this is a recovery plan and not an old-age pension plan. They claim that we can, by taxation, place $28,000,-000,000 into the hands of 12,000,000 people 60 years of age and over and bring about great prosperity by requiring them to spend this money every 30 days, and in no event can they have any of this money in their possession more than 35 days. Some of the proponents of this bill are now urging that they do not expect the $200 a month for there are 12,000,000 people to come within this proposed law. Let us quote from Dr. Townsend. On page 616 of the Ways and Means Committee hearings Congressman McCormack asked the following questions and received the answers thereto:

Mr. McCormack. In other words, the $200 is only a starting point? Dr. Townsend. That is all.

Mr. McCormack. And you say that that amount should be revised as the result of a survey every 5 years?

Dr. Townsend. Yes, sir.

Dr. Townsend further testified on page 655 of the hearings:

Mr. McCormack. When you say you later believe it should go to $300 then you disown the principle at $200 at this time.

Dr. Townsend. No; not the principle at all.

Mr. McCormack. In other words, the $200 is not your objective; it is only a means to an end? Dr. Townsend. That is all.

Dr. Townsend's testimony on page 609 of the hearings is as follows:

And under your bill you provide for a pension without regard to whether or not reasonable need exists. That is so, is it not?

Dr. Townsend. I would abolish the needs test entirely.

On page 618 of the hearings, Dr. Townsend stated:

Mr. McCormack. Let me get this; need is not the test in order to get a pension?

Dr. Townsend. It shouldn't be.

Mr. McCormack. And it is not intended by you it should be? Dr. TOWNSEND. No.

The Hendricks bill, H. R. 6466, introduced on May 23 and now before us is supposed to contain, as I understand it, amendments suggested by Dr. Townsend to H. R. 2. Dr. Townsend was inquired of, when he testified, as to the number of persons the bill would cover. On page 616 of the hearings, Dr. Townsend testified as follows:

Mr. McCormack. Suppose this amendment of yours were carried into effect; suppose that any person, whether engaged in gainful occupation or not, as you construe it, was eligible. How many then would come within the purview of your bill?

Dr. Townsend. About 12,000,000, I think.

Mr. McCormack. And you say about 12,000,000 would be eligible with the amendment you advocate?
Dr. Towsend. Something like that; yes.

If I can understand simple English language, Dr. Townsend testified that under his bill persons who are 60 years of age, whether they need a pension or not, will get it. They may be worth $10,000,000 and own a great deal of property, yet they would be entitled to the pension from the day they are 60 years of age, and this would make 12,000,000 eligible for the pension. Dr. Townsend's plan is to start at $200 a month and in a few years increase it to $300 a month.

TWO HUNDRED DOLLARS A MONTH - 12,000,000 PENSIONERS-$28,800,000,000 ANNUALLY

It is a simple problem of arithmetic-$200 a month means $2,400 a year for each pensioner, and with 12,000,000 pensioners it would cost $28,800,000,000 a year on a basis of $200 a month; but if it should be increased to $300 a month, as Dr. Townsend asserts, in a very few years it would cost $43,-200,000,000 a year, provided there would be no increase in the number of persons 60 years of age.

The Members of the House, including myself, received a statement from a prominent leader in the Townsend movement. He has this entire matter figured out along the line stated by Dr. Townsend. Of course, this money to pay these enormous sums would be raised by transaction, income, and consumers' or sales taxes. The money will not be picked off of bushes or trees. The money must come in the way of taxes out of the pockets of the taxpayers of the Nation. This Townsend leader submits the figures and I have seen it from other Townsend leaders. He says that in 1929, when the country was prosperous, there was a turn-over of transactions in this country amounting to $1,000,300,000,000, and this 2-percent Townsend tax on each transaction would bring in $26,000,000,000. He says it would cost $540,000,000 to collect this $26,000,000,000 in taxes, and he estimates that at least 8,000,000 people would draw the $200 a month, and they would be paid annually $19,200,000,000 a year in benefits, and after paying the pensions and the cost of collecting the twenty-six billion of taxes there would be a balance left of $6,280,000,000 to pay every year on the national debt.

Now, this man sets forth the general argument of the supporters of the Townsend plan. Under this plan we are not only going to pay $200 a month to everybody 60 years of age and over that wants it, whether he is rich or poor, in need or in plenty, but collect the enormous sum of $26,000,000,000 in taxes, bring about prosperity, and have left $6,280,000,000 to pay annually on the national debt!

We must not overlook the fact that all the money collected last year by the Federal Government in taxes, both direct and hidden-income taxes, tobacco, cigarette, whisky, gas, oil, tariff, taxes, and every other tax-all amounted to less than $6,000,000,000, and this $6,000,000,000 was used to pay on the expenses of the Government-the Army, Navy, veterans' pensions and compensation, relief, benefits to agriculture, and so forth.

WHO WILL PAY THESE ENORMOUS TAXES?

The farmers, the railroad, shop, factory, and mine workers, and the common folks, will pay the most of these enormous taxes. It is in the nature of a consumers' or sales tax. This tax would be levied on everything that is consumed by any human being in this country, from the cradle to the gravefood, clothing, shelter, amusement, education, and everything. As the farmers and the working people of this country are the big consumers they must carry the load. The farmers and the working people who, because of their toil many of them die before they are 60 years of age, will receive no pensions from this utopian scheme-this pipe dream of Dr. Townsend. Most of those who toil little and are well to do and who take care of themselves will live beyond the 60 years, and under Dr. Townsend's idea will receive from $200 to $300 a month, and if they have a wife over 60 it will run from $400 to $600 a month for the husband and wife.

The average farmer does not average $50 a month for himself and family. I doubt if the working people in these times are averaging over $60 a month for themselves and families. There will be taken away from the workingman and his family of his wages earned and income approximately 20 percent to finance the Townsend plan. The producer of hides will be taxed 2 percent and he will turn his hides and taxes over to the manufacturer of shoes and leather goods. The manufacturer will have to pay a tax. He will hand the producer's and manufacturer's taxes over to the wholesaler. The wholesaler, when he sells the product to the jobber will hand over his own taxes as well as the producer's and manufacturer's taxes, and when the jobber sells the goods to the retailer he hands over his tax and all the other taxes to the retailer, and when the retailer sells the shoes or other articles to the consumer, he hands over to the consumer his tax and all the other taxes.

The entire income of the American people last yearall the income of agriculture, labor, industry, commerce, and the professions (and this means the gross and not the net income)—was a little over $62,000,000,000. We have 130,000,000 people in this country. If Dr. Townsend's plan was put into effect and we paid these pensions to 12,000,000 people at $200 per month, 9 percent of our population would receive nearly half of all the gross income of all our people last year. The highest gross income the people of this Nation have ever had was a little over $30,000,000,000. This pension would be more than 33 percent of the total gross income of this Nation in its most prosperous year.

It is insisted by Dr. Townsend and his friends that this is not a pension bill but it is a recovery bill. It will bring about prosperity in this country. Of course, these tremendous taxes would be reflected in the cost of everything that our people buy. It would greatly increase the cost of living. Dr. Townsend admits in his testimony it would more than likely eliminate hundreds of thousands of small businessmen and middlemen who provide employment for some eight to ten million workers in this country.

President Roosevelt under his policies has been spending five or six billion dollars more each year than was necessary to carry on the usual functions of the Federal Government in the hope that this spending would bring about prosperity but we find unemployment and the relief rolls on the increase under that policy. Dr. Townsend would increase President Roosevelt's pump-priming by 500 percent. Dr. Townsend's plan is so wild that it cannot and is not accepted by the President or his most ardent new dealers.

We have about 50,000,000 people in this country that must depend upon salaries and wages for their living. They must work. All the wages paid to the workers of this country amount to less than $47,000,000,000 a year. I wonder how long these millions of workers would be willing to pay in pensions to 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 persons who do not work more than half the sum they receive in wages and salaries. I wish I could believe and that it would be true that this Utopian scheme would bring about recovery and give to a man and his wife 60 years of age or over from $400 to $600 a month to spend. If I could believe that, there could be no power on earth that could keep me from voting for this bill. However, out on the farm I heard it said many times that a man could not lift himself over the fence by pulling up on his bootstraps. If the Townsend plan can work out, then a man can lift himself over the fence by pulling up on his bootstraps.

A KENTUCKY DOCTOR HAD A BETTER PLAN

A certain Kentucky doctor-and I refrain from using his name-had what I consider a much better plan than Dr. Townsend. He prepared and sent to me a bill and requested me to introduce it. He had the same idea in mind that Dr. Townsend and his friends have—that we can tax and squander ourselves into prosperity. He criticized Dr. Townsend's plan because Dr. Townsend limited his pensions to those 60 years of age and over. The Kentucky doctor provided in his bill to put every child the day it was born on the pension rolls at so much per month until the child reached the age of 15 years, and then it was increased, and at 21 years it was increased some more. It was further increased after 30, 40, 60, and so forth. He took the position that if the payment of pensions to ten or twelve million of our population would bring about prosperity, to provide a pension for 130,000,000 would increase the Townsend prosperity about tenfold.

WHAT ABOUT NEEDY WIDOWS AND BLIND OR DISABLED PERSONS?

This Government pays a pension of $100 per month to a veteran who was totally and permanently disabled in line of duty in defense of our country. His wife gets nothing. If he dies by reason of the disabilities contracted in the service in line of duty his widow gets from $30 to $37.50 per month. Under the Townsend plan the husband, if over 60 and with no disabilities from defending our country or any other cause, gets $200 per month; and if his wife is living and is over 60, she will likewise get $200 a month; and if either one dies the other will continue to draw $200 or perhaps $300, as stated by Dr. Townsend.

I am satisfied we have a million or more needy widows in this country with young children who are far under 60 years of age, and we have hundreds of thousands, and perhaps a million or more, of people who are poor and needy and are totally and permanently disabled by accident or disease who are under 60, and there are hundreds of thousands of needy blind in this Nation. This bill does not give any relief to them, and under the gag rule under which this bill was brought in there is no way on earth to amend it to give any relief to needy disabled veterans, to needy widows, needy blind, or needy disabled persons under 60 years of age.

I wonder how many working people or poor farmers in any community would be willing to be taxed about 20 percent of their wages, salaries, or income to give to some wealthy man and his wife from $400 to $600 a month merely because they are 60 years of age.

KENTUCKIANS WOULD BE TAXED $532,259,460 ANNUALLY

The people of Kentucky feel that they are heavily taxed to carry on their State government, for highways, schools, charitable and penal institutions, and for other purposes. The total cost of Kentucky's State government is approximately $25,000,000 a year. Under the Townsend plan, as stated by Dr. Townsend, the Federal Government would collect from the people of Kentucky in the way of transaction, income, consumers', and sales taxes $532,259,460 to pay the pensions under the Townsend plan for a single year. In other words, Dr. Townsend and his friends insist that I vote for a bill that would tax the people of Kentucky and to a large extent the farmers, workers, and common people, 20 times the amount they are now taxed to carry on all the activities of the government of the State of Kentucky. The $25,000,000 spent by the State of Kentucky is for the benefit of all the people of Kentucky. This $532,259,460 would be turned over to about 9 percent of the population of Kentucky.

I have never heard of a proposal more fantastic or more inequitable than the bill now before us. Only five of the people in my district have asked me to vote for it, and I am thoroughly convinced if they made a study of Dr. Townsend's testimony alone these five would not ask me to vote for this bill

Last year we spent for pensions and compensation, hospital treatment, and all other activities for and in behalf of the millions of defenders of our country and their widows and orphans $539,000,000. Under the Townsend proposal we would collect from the people of Kentucky and turn over to 9 percent of Kentucky's population $532,259,460—thousands of them in perfect health at 60 and with plenty of money in the bank and broad acres of fertile land.

FAVOR FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PAYING $25 MONTHLY TO NEEDY, AGED, BLIND, AND DISABLED

I have always favored and urged adequate old-age pensions for the needy old people of this country, the needy blind, the needy disabled, and the needy widows and their children.

The President's social-security bill, which included old-age pensions, left it up to the States to fix the conditions under which persons could secure old-age pensions and fix the amount thereof, and the Federal Government would pay half of the amount paid out by the respective States for old-age pensions. When that bill was under consideration in 1935 I offered an amendment which provided that the Federal Government would pay at least $25 per month to each needy person 60 years of age or over, $25 per month to each needy blind person, and $25 per month to each person totally and permanently disabled by reason of being crippled or diseased. I took the position that needy blind people and needy disabled persons even though not 60 years of age required assistance just as much as needy persons over 60 years of age. President Roosevelt was against my amendment. They had a majority in the House of about 3 to 1. My amendment was defeated by the administration, its leaders, and supporters.

If my amendment had been adopted, every needy person 60 years of age or over, every needy blind person, and every needy permanently disabled person would now be receiving at least $25 per month from the Federal Government. If a needy person 60 years of age or over had a wife 60 years of age or over, blind or disabled, she would likewise receive $25 per month. They both together would receive $50 per month. I offered that amendment and tried to have them adopt it because I knew Kentucky and many other States would fail to provide adequate pensions for these groups and politics might enter into the administration of the old-age pension law.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS OF KENTUCKY AND OTHER STATES INADEQUATE

The Kentucky Legislature, controlled by the Democrats, under the present Social Security Act fixed the minimum age at 65 and the maximum pension at $15 a month. In other words Kentucky under that law would not put up more than $7.50 per month per person and, of course, the Federal Government could not put up more than $7.50 per month as a maximum. In the administration of the old-age-pension law in Kentucky many needy old people 65 years of age or over receive as low as $4 and $6 per month, and the average pension paid to them has been less than $9 per month.

The Republicans in the Kentucky House and Senate at the last session of the Kentucky Legislature offered an amendment to increase the maximum to $30 per month, $15 to be paid by the State of Kentucky and $15 to be paid by the Federal Government, and every Republican in the house and senate voted for that amendment, but the Democrats defeated that amendment and prevented any change in the Kentucky law, fixing the maximum at $15 per month, and in actual practice the old-age pensions that have been paid on an average are less than $9 per month. Furthermore, according to the report of the director of old-age pensions in Kentucky, about 90,00 needy old people have made application for old-age assistance, but only about 45,000 have been put on the pension rolls at less than $9 per month on an average. I have been advised in letters from the director of old-age pensions that thousands of these needy old people must be denied pensions because the Kentucky Legislature, controlled by the Democrats, has failed to provide sufficient funds to take care of the needy old people of Kentucky 65 years of age or over at the pitiful and inadequate rate of less than $9 a month. I know of no case where the husband is getting an old-age pension that such pension has also been. granted to the wife. However, there may be such cases.

We have had lots of politics in the administration of oldage pensions in Kentucky. I understand there has been some improvement. In one rich farming Democratic county of Kentucky of about 10,000 population, more old-age pensions have been granted than in a poor Republican county with approximately 30,000 population. In my own congressional district I have observed the old-age pension administration being used in city, county, State, and National races. In my amendment I hoped to take the old-age pensions out of politics and to give to the needy old citizens of the United States the same consideration. In Kentucky they get less than $9 a month on an average. In Mississippi I am informed they receive about $4 per month, while in some States they receive more than $30 per month. We must take old-age pensions and other relief out of politics. Politics has no place in human misery. These pensions should go to the needy. Our oldage pension program should be honest, impartial, and should be adequate. The State and Federal Government should provide at least $30 per month for each needy old person.

If I desired to play politics on this measure I would speak and vote for it, and if possible get it passed in the House and Senate and send it to the White House, because I know and we all know the President is against this bill and will veto it if we pass it.

One of my Democrat friends from Florida stood up and voted against my amendment to the President's social-security bill in 1935. Today he made a speech for the Townsend bill and talks about economic royalists being against this bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I am not referring to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. Hendricks], it was another Member from Florida. The President spoke of a lot of people in the South as being feudal lords. I see a lot of the feudal lords of the South are against this bill today. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Has the gentleman read the bill?
Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes; I have read the bill and I understand what I read and know more about the bill than the gentleman who is trying to interrupt me.

[Applause.]

If Dr. Townsend and his friends had not agreed to this gag rule and had insisted on bringing the bill in under an open rule so that we could amend and improve it, we could then have worked out amendments that would greatly benefit the needy old people of this Nation, but Dr. Townsend thinks and talks in terms of a pension of $200 per month and to be increased to $300 per month to every one 60 years of age or over whether they need it or not. Why should he and his friends continue to shadow box? Why not come down to earth, and instead of promising impossibilities, support measures that will bring real benefits to those who need them?

Last year the American people paid for all taxes for schools, towns, cities, counties, States, and the Nation, about $15,000,000,000. Under Dr. Townsend's plan it would take $28,800,000,000 to pay each person 60 years of age $200 a month. The total amount of taxes collected last year amounting to $15,000,000,000 was for the benefit of 130,000,000 people. Twenty-eight billion eight hundred million dollars proposed under the Townsend plan is to be turned over to 12,000,000 people, only about 9 percent of our entire population. This proposition is fantastic, unworkable, unreasonable, and I cannot support it. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Schafer].

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, having some love and affection for my country, I shall be pleased to vote to send this half-baked, crackpot legislative monstrosity back to the committee for consideration and a committee report.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I regret that I cannot yield to the gentleman as I have only 4 minutes.

I ask my Republican colleagues who denounce the New Deal drunken, spending spree, my Republican colleagues who weep crocodile tears about an unbalanced Budget, and who express fear that it will result in bankruptcy and inflation, to hesitate before you support his $8,000,000,000 pyramided sales-tax measure.

To those Republican colleagues who vote for this legislative monstrosity, let me say I do not want to hear another word of criticism of the New Deal spending spree, unbalanced Budget, or free-trade policies. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, Republicans have denounced the New Deal reciprocal-trade agreements day in and day out. We take a position to preserve our American market for our American producers to their full capacity to supply it. We are considering under a gag rule this bill which will raise $8,000,000,000 through a pyramided sales tax and increase the cost of every manufactured, agricultural, and industrial product about 20 percent.

Since this bill does not provide for an increase in the tariff rates on foreign competitive imports and under the gag rule an amendment to do so is prohibited, the enactment of the bill will throw millions of our people who are now employed into the ranks of our unemployed, who now number about 12,000,000. The enactment of the pending bill will be equivalent to a 20-percent reduction in all existing tariff rates and will result in a flood of foreign imports which do not have to carry the burden of most of the pyramided sales taxes which American products with which they compete must carry under this Townsend bill.

Mr. Chairman, we read in Holy Writ:

Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone.

Mr. Chairman, the record indicates that Dr. Townsend is that kind of a man and a first-class demagogue, faker, and racketeer. He first promised our elderly people $200 a month. He has changed his bill many times and now states that the pending bill, which is his latest version, will give them about $60 a month. Notwithstanding this fact, many of Dr. Townsend's followers still believe they will receive $200 a month pension because the doctor adroitly incorporated in the pending measure a provision that the pension should not exceed $200 a month.

Every working man and woman in America will have their cost of living increased about 20 percent if this bill with its super sales tax becomes law. The W.P.A. worker who is now getting $60 a month will have his cost of living increased 20 percent. The increased cost of living under this bill will in effect be equivalent to a 20-percent reduction in the pay check of every worker in America and the compensation check of all disabled American war veterans, their widows, orphans, and dependents.

Mr. Chairman, all conservative Jeffersonian Democrats and Republicans who adhere to the philosophy of Abraham Lincoln should join and overwhelmingly defeat this bill, and send word to the country that we still have sanity in government. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, did someone mention something about demagogy? It seems to me we have just witnessed one of the most flagrant examples of demagogy by the gentleman who just preceded me. We have heard this afternoon speakers rise in the Well of this House and tell us that the economists are not in favor of this Townsend principle or plan, those same economists, Mr. Chairman, who perhaps had a great deal to do with writing the present monstrosity that is on the books of this Nation in the form of the present Social Security Act. We have heard Members get up in the Well of the House this afternoon and tell us about the proceedings that occurred before the socalled inquisition committee, headed by the honorable gentleman from Missouri, 3 years ago and we have heard those arguments cut and dried and rehashed over again this afternoon, all water over the dam, and absolutely nothing to do with the economic problem or the economic principle contained within this particular piece of legislation.

Mr. Chairman, as one Member of Congress, I welcome this opportunity to be placed on the spot with reference to the issue presented here today. Furthermore, I am deeply grateful that the opportune moment has finally arrived when I can arise on the floor of this House and support the Townsend principle of old-age pensions or annuities as presented in the legislation now pending before this great body.

I am pleased and motivated to this action, not only because thousands of good citizens in my congressional district and State desire it, but also because I am sincerely convinced that a distribution of social dividends to millions of our people through the medium offered in the pending bill is entirely necessary and most desirable in the best interests of our national economy.

In order to appreciate the vital economic significance of this proposition, we must face fearlessly and boldly the fact that the capitalistic economy of this Nation which we all desire to have preserved and perpetuated must be continually underwritten or subsidized. My conception of the national economy under a system of free competition and free governmental processes leads me to the conclusion that this underwriting or subsidizing has been found during our past history in the incident of savings or debt accumulations. In this connection, the recent testimony before the Temporary National Economic Committee to the effect that an additional debt accumulation through the medium of self-liquidating public projects is necessary in order to reemploy our idle millions and to repay existing debt through pay rolls is most pertinent and interesting.

No person will deny that our great material progress has been made possible by the fact that we have builded on the sound rock of thrift. But, the large majority of those who concern themselves about our economic destiny apparently lose sight of the fact that for every dollar of savings accumulated through thrift and put to interest-bearing investment use, there must necessarily be a like dollar of debt. Therefore, we will find that in periods of expansion or so-called prosperity we have our savings for the most part translated into evidences of debt. In other words, debt expansion goes hand-in-hand with savings as they are accumulated and invested. When large amounts of savings, being used in the investment or speculative markets, have caused the expansion of debt to a point where the service charges and principle payments of that debt load can no longer be met without a serious diminution of current purchasing power for the ordinary demands of life, then we have a breakdown of this process or cycle. A depression results. Debt obligation cannot be met and we have a period of liquidation. During this period, it seems to me that any debtor who cannot pay off is in the position of having received a subsidy. He has received something which he does not pay back. He has been underwritten. The greater the debt expansion, the more serious the depression. All this means to me that in order to utilize our plant structure and make job opportunities available in mass volume, we always have and must continue to underwrite our economy with subsidies to somebody.

During the World War we underwrote our economy through the medium of millions of foreigners when we shipped them a tremendous volume of goods and services, for which we accepted evidences of debt. We gave them these things because we never received the payment for those things. In my opinion, we never shall. But while we were thusly subsidizing our allies in World War days we had full employment at home.

During the peacetime era of 1922–27 we did the same thing with South America and Germany. We gave them steel, copper, cement, and all sorts of construction materials. We gave them real wealth in return for worthless bonds which will never be paid. But, while we were doing so, we experienced full employment in this country. It is true that in this period we were also piling up debt tokens domestically in the form of installment purchasing and speculative gambling. This, however, only accentuated our so-called good times. People who were willing and able to work could find jobs in private enterprise. Each was to this degree the master of his own destiny—a situation which does not prevail today, and for which we as Members of Congress are to a large degree responsible—and a situation which legislation of this type will help to meet.

Now then, Mr. Chairman, I can only draw one conclusion from our past experience and that is that underwriting our economy is just as essential to our well-being as breathing is to life. We must underwrite either through increasing and continuing debt accumulation, publicly or privately, or we must devise some monetary and tax vehicle for riding through the storm of deflation and depression on a cash-and-carry basis. One thing is certain and that is that mass production can only be made possible by mass consumption. Furthermore, one other thing is certain and that is that any underwriting of our economy should be confined to our people and not spread out to foreigners as it has been in the past. If we must subsidize millions of people, and I believe that is the case, then these recipients should be our own. Of course as their answer to the present economic paradox, international bankers will advocate, as one did recently before a Senate committee, the spreading of our surplus gold supply over foreign nations. In other words, his idea was the underwriting once again of foreigners to accomplish full employment in America. Mr. Chairman, my idea and the idea of Townsendites is that any spreading of gold, dollars, or goods and services should and must be confined to our own people within our own borders. This pending legislation is based on this very proposition. We believe that the plant structure of America is fully capable of producing an abundance of goods and services to the end that our people, both aged and young, may live as citizens of the greatest and wealthiest Nation should live. Furthermore, we believe that the American people are demanding that legislative action be forthcoming to make this possible under the process of free institutions and the competitive system of economy.

In the past history of our economy, as I have attempted to indicate, we have prospered because we have expanded, through the use of credit and its corresponding debt, the purchasing power of our people. We have permitted private bankers and financial interests to monetize private credit or debt on a pyramiding basis. We have allowed private parties through this process to take advantage of a sovereign and constitutional right of this Government of ours. By so doing, however, at least we obtained, for temporary intervals of time, prosperity. We made it possible for our Nation to work at productive and private enterprise. We gave individuals who were willing and able to work the opportunity for gainful occupation, which in turn furnished each and every person the chance to carve out his own economic fate. During the years since the Federal Reserve Act has been in operation we have gone one step further. Since that time we have permitted the same private interests to monetize public credit or debt through the so-called purchase of Government bonds. During these days of constant and heavy public-debt accumulation we have witnessed work-relief opportunities being made for a chosen class of our unemployed employables on a pittance level. This has been done on the theory of making new purchasing power, but it has been restricted and inhibited by the process of monetizing public credit or debt through the private medium referred to above. Now we have the build-up being developed before the Monopoly Committee: That we should further monetize credit or debt by the creation of additional credit institutions and the further insurance of business loans by the Federal Government. In other words, every time that any economist, financier, or brain truster opens his bazoo about new purchasing power, he predicates his recommendations for increasing our money supply and the use of the same by immediate consumers on some vehicle for the monetization of debt or credit? Why is this? Why this continual obeisance to debt or credit which is the same thing? Why do these experts not think in direct terms of production? Why beat around the bush indirectly in a mad rush to create more debt or credit in order to put into use more purchasing power? If, in order to effectuate a full utilization of our idle manpower and our idle plant structure we must give away a certain percentage of our production, why not face the issue frankly and ascertain the proper domestic vehicle to employ whereby such a distribution may be made with the least amount of demoralization and the greatest amount of productive employment? Obviously, pensions offer the medium and our worthy people economically unemployable as a result of age offer one deserving and practical vehicle for such underwriting. In other words, let us monetized production directly in lieu of an indirect monetization based on debt or credit and furnish our people over 60 years of age with a share of that production—a share large enough to keep them in complete comfort for the balance of their declining years. This is not a matter of sentiment. It is a matter of cold, hard common sense. Foreign markets are not necessary for the consumption of our surpluses as long as millions of American citizens are starving, cold, and indecently sheltered.

Monetization of our productive capacity without debt, distributed through the medium of pensions and taxation, will reach the root of our trouble. But this continual approach along the line of establishing bigger and better credit or debt bases is only playing with dynamite. The failure to face this issue honestly and openly now, in my opinion, is the last straw that will break the camel's back. Remember that somebody's credit is somebody else's debt if the credit is put to interest-bearing use. The more that the debt bubble is expanded, the sooner and worse will be the explosion. This Nation or any other people can never effect permanent and full employment of our employables by attempting to restore and continue our economy on a base of debt or credit. The underwriting of our unemployables with goods and services will employ our employables, just as quickly and much more effectively than doing the same thing for foreigners in foreign markets. But the starving of our unemployables and the underwriting of our employables through the pittance existence of W. P. A., and the debt base of P. W. A., is basically and essentially crackpot. It cannot succeed and will eventually bring this Nation to the threshold of disaster. According to my interpretation, Townsendism stands as the symbol of a reasonable, sensible, and proper employment of our productive plant and of our ambitious, energetic, and capable manpower.

The present Social Security Act in titles I and II does not in any way recognize the possibility of underwriting our economy through the medium of old-age annuities. Title I is an un-American proposition. It has developed discrimination between States and between citizens within the same State. It is based on the needs test and practically requires the pauperization of the applicant. Merely the incident of residence in a State which is more liberal and more wealthy, places some of our worthy aged citizens in the preferred position of receiving far larger remittances than the same type of citizen receives in another State. In many States, including my own State, we find the un-American result of John Jones receiving old-age assistance and his neighbor, Sam Smith, not receiving anything although the need of both of these worthy and good citizens is absolutely on a parallel. In other words, because title I is based on a State matching dollar formula, adequate financial provisions throughout the various States to treat all alike under the law are impossible. Certainly this is rank discrimination and un-American in its very concept and practice. Title II, or the old-age insurance phase of the Social Security Act. establishes a fantastic system of contributory payments from more than 40,000,000 of United States workers. Under the amendments recommended by the Social Security Board and the majority of the able members of the great Ways and Means Committee, liberalization of existing provisions are to be provided at the expense of those savers who accumulate more over a longer period of time. In other words, the maximum payments available under this monstrosity of title II are to be decreased to pay more at an earlier date to those who would be only entitled to smaller annuities under the original formula. Thus we have here again the penalizing of one class of workers to benefit another group. In short, a further sharing of poverty by the relatively poor-a process which has been continually established by these New Deal crackpot policies.

The pending bill, whether or not it is perfect in each and every detail, at least is predicated on the proposition that American citizens should eat, clothe themselves, and dwell on a level commensurate with American dignity. It does not necessitate the pauperization of that class of our citizens to whom the present generation of workers owes everything than it has. It does not discriminate in any sense of the word against any citizen. It is based on the sound and just premise that all contribute and all collect. It does not necessitate an army of administrative employees in the States and in Washington as does the existing monstrosity with its 40,000,000 and more of 30-cent savings accounts. It does not seek to establish a reserve of paper I O U's to be paid for with future tax receipts as does the financial legerdemain of the present law. But, rather is it based on a pay-as-we-go, open, and honest tax formula, which treats all alike.

In short, Mr. Chairman, the Townsend bill and the Townsend principle recognize the need of underwriting our economy on a cash rather than a debt basis. It recognizes the need of distributing dollars directly to millions of our most worthy citizens in order to provide jobs for others in producing the goods and services which these dollars will purchase. The food-stamp financing and underwriting of our food surpluses through the medium of those on work relief is only another example of this principle, although on a most inadequate distribution basis. The Townsend principle recognizes the need of placing our old-age annuity system on a national basis in order to extend justice to all with discrimination against none. It recognizes the principle that retirement after a life of useful application should be a badge of honor and distinction and not the label of pauperization. The Townsend principle is right, just, fair, and American, and should be adopted. As one Member of the Seventy-sixth Congress, I am deeply appreciative of this opportunity to place myself on record in support of legislation which is truly based on the principle of abundance and American justice.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, let me state that America can contribute far more to civilization by solving our domestic economic paradox under a free economy and free institutions than it ever could offer by spreading itself so thinly in world affairs that all will perish in the inevitable conflict and collapse which must follow a continuance of present national and international economic conditions. The Townsend principle and the Townsend idea comprise a vital link in the chain of legislation which must be forged if America is to make its contribution to world welfare on such a basis.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 9 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Dingell].

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, as a consistent supporter of old-age pensions and other security legislation which my time will not permit me to discuss now, I have stood on this floor and pleaded the cause of the aged citizen and never yielded in my attitude of liberality.

I insisted on such amounts to be paid jointly from the treasuries of the United States and the respective States as would guarantee to the pensioners comfort and decency of maintenance in old age.

I opposed the imposition of the pauper's oath and other degrading, burdensome, and superficial conditions. And I repeat what many of you heard me say on previous occasions on this floor, that I advocated these liberal pensions long before I was elected to Congress as a Representative of the Fifteenth District of Michigan. I was in the vanguard of the liberal-pension advocates. I carried the banner before Townsendism was ever heard of, back in the early twenties when it was very unpopular to talk about the subject. At that time such radicalism as pensions for the aged was referred to as socialism, paternalism, or rank nonsense. hoped and prayed for the day when people of the United States would consider and adopt a sane, equitable pension plan which would ban the specter of want and poverty in old age, wiping out at the same time the curse of the poorhouse and assure our people contentment and happiness in their declining years. Providentially, I am sure I was permitted not only to work for such a bill in committee but actually to aid in its preparation and finally witness its passage. The crowning glory and satisfaction of it all was realized to the fullest extent when I was permitted to witness at the White House the signing of the Social Security Act by our great humanitarian President who spoke briefly, though with feeling and satisfaction, about the measure which was to all intents and purposes a good beginning of a great and noble undertaking. To me the Social Security Act is the one sound and certain plan which will be liberalized as you will see for yourselves to such an extent as will justify the confidence of the Congress and of the people. The plan which will be presented is not as generous as I would like it to be but it is basically sound and elastic enough to be further liberalized and expanded as time, conditions, and finances of the Nation will permit.

I never misled anyone as to my attitude about the Townsend plan; I analyzed it carefully, open-mindedly, and for the following reasons I felt and declared that I could not support it. I took the lashing of the Townsendites in 1936 and again in 1938. Fakers who would not vote for a monthly pension of 200 cents masquerading as friends of the Townsend movement were given the blessing of Townsend leaders, and the mass vote of misguided, sincere, old folks was directed to favor their worst enemies to the detriment of myself, who never missed the chance to speak, act, and vote for liberal pensions.

The Townsend plan as presented to you according to the mass testimony contained in the hearings on the social-security bill, given by witnesses of unimpeachable character, whose standing cannot be questioned in the field of business, social reform, economics, actuarial science, labor, and church affairs, is preponderantly and unmistakably in opposition to the scheme. There is a most significant unanimity of opinion that the plan would bankrupt the Nation; that it would place a crushing tax upon the great mass of our workers, farmers, storekeepers, small-business men, upon widows, orphans, and the poor, who are least able to bear them. Transactions taxes, with the added gross income tax graduated, as in the modified Townsend bill, H. R. 6466, would destroy business, increase unemployment, and accentuate misery and want, provided it was constitutional. Think of the possible effect upon the cost of clothing, milk, meats, and staple food products. Take bread as a good illustration; the accumulated transactions taxes, which are nothing less than multiple sales taxes, would be applied at the rate of 2 percent at least a hundred times before you bought a loaf from your grocer. This multiple sales tax would begin piling up even before the wheat was planted and before the seed wheat was purchased by the farmer. The farmer would pay the tax on seed wheat; someone would pay on the hauling, planting, harvesting, selling, storing, shipping, and then the elevator operator comes in for additional multiple taxes. The same applies to the miller, the baker, the distributor, and the grocer. Railroads, middlemen, buyers, brokers, distributors, and supply houses would all have to pay the tax. Every worker, whether on the farm or in the mill, bakery, grocery, or delivery serviceanyone and everyone who had to do with any transaction in connection with wheat and the ultimate bread would pay one or more times, and altogether the taxes would be added to the cost, and the consumer would finally pay it all. Testimony bears out my contention that the Townsend plan would not remove from the pay rolls but a very small number of men who are now in active employment at the age of 65 or even at the age of 60 years. The fact of the matter is that industry does not employ men, and much less women, of that age. They are the exception as to employability, not the rule. Industry geared to high speed and efficiency today rejects workers after their forty-fifth year. Such men as are employed at the age of 65 are self-employed in their own business, and few are they in number who would give up their business even for the Townsend plan.

All economists and experts who testified agree on what I have always contended, that the Townsend plan does not create new wealth; quite the contrary, it stifles the natural process of growing wealth. It does not and cannot speed up purchasing power. It merely shifts the purchasing power from the younger folks and transfers it to the old folks. It deprives the younger folks of money which they need to meet the pressing responsibilities of clothing, feeding, housing, and educating their families, restricts their activities in every instance where their means, often limited, are vitally needed. Those younger men and women with their family responsibilities, with keen appetites, ambitions, and desires, will be taxed into stagnation and paralysis in order to pay a Townsend pension, which the old folks are led to believe will amount to $200 per month. The old folks no longer having the responsibilities, desires, appetites, ambitions, or inclinations, will have to be lashed to spend the amount of their pension in order to get rid of it within the prescribed period of time specified in the bill before you. You cannot argue that you are going to put on full speed ahead when you propose a plan that is perfection in reverse. If you want to add velocity to the dollar, speed up recovery; or if you want to put the money into such hands as can spend it quickly and for useful purposes, and where the physical stamina is present to sustain forced spending, then reverse your proposition and pay the pension under the Townsend plan to those under 65 years of age, leaving the Social Security Act to provide decent, livable, certain pensions for our worthy old folks.

I cannot vote for this bill, because I have calculated very carefully the costs in added taxes which might be levied upon the people of the State of Michigan, and particularly upon the people of the Fifteenth Congressional District, which I have the honor to represent, in the event this bill should pass.

Here are some cold, merciless figures which I must face: Michigan paid for 1938 internal-revenue taxes in the amount of $308,182,920.50. If the Townsend bill becomes law the people of Michigan will be forced to pay an added $147.69 per capita tax. That means for every man, woman, and child, if 8,000,000 pensioners are placed upon the Nation's pension rolls, or $706,401,270. If 10,000,000 pensioners are to be enrolled—and this figure, according to expert testimony, will eventually be increased—then the added per capita tax for the Townsend pension plan rises to $184.62 for every man, woman, and child in the State, reaching the stupendous total figure of $883,037,460 for this purpose alone.

Thus the grand total of all prospective and existing Federal impositions would be the sum of $706,401,270 plus $308,182,-920.50, or $1,014,584,190.50, provided the pension rolls did not exceed 8,000,000 pensioners.

If 10,000,000 pensioners are to be provided for throughout the Nation, Michigan taxpayers will have to pay a "little bit more." You will add present internal-revenue tax of $308,-182,920.50 to $883,037,460, making a total of $1,191,220,380.50.

If the pension paid is to be $100 per month, Michigan will pay $661,383,555.50, or $749,701,650.50, depending upon whether 8,000,000 or 10,000,000 pensioners are to be provided for. These last figures should be reduced on the same basis if $50 per month is to be paid, so as to read as follows:

Total taxes $484,783,237.50, or a total, including present Federal taxes, of $528,942,285.50.

If the people of my district want me to vote for the Townsend plan, and I am sure they do not, then I want them to know the cost of Townsend's folly.

Using the same basis of per capita tax payments upon the 378,630 people living in my district—population of 1930—and the same number of pensioners, the table works out in this manner and in the following totals:

Estimated pension tax collectible annually under the Townsend plan as it would apply to the Fifteenth Congressional District of Michigan (population of 1930, 378,630)

Number of pensioners	Rate of pension	. Per capita tax	Total annual pension tax to be collected, Fifteenth District
8,000,000	$200	$147. 69	$55, 919, 864, 70
	100	73. 84	27, 959, 932, 35
	50	36. 92	13, 979, 966, 17
	200	184. 62	69, 902, 670, 69
	100	92. 31	34, 951, 335, 30
	50	46. 15	17, 475, 667, 65

Those figures are nearly as large as the entire tax budget of the city of Detroit. If tax burdens are to make my people happy and contented they certainly ought to be happy with what is in prospect for them under the Townsend plan.

I will put into the Record a table of added taxes which would be collectible over and above the internal-revenue taxes paid by the various States of the Union, and I invite you to read them, study them, and I am sure they will interest you, even if they do not convince you that the Townsend plan is folly, sheer madness, which will destroy the Government and wipe out all the gains thus far made under the social-security plan. Such a blow will set us back so far that we will never dare talk of pensions of any kind in the dismal future.

I have served my constituents faithfully, earnestly, and, I hope, reasonably well. If I am in error in this instance, if I have inadvertently failed to sense their desires as regards the Townsend plan, then bless my soul. They who by their support and suffrage sent me to Congress will likely order me to stay home. I know they will be pleased, however, in knowing and hearing repeated my statement that because I am convinced that the Townsend plan is a snare, a delusion, and a dangerous experiment that I shall have to vote against the bill. I would rather be right than in Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Landis].

PAY-AS-YOU-GO PENSION

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, look at this picture:

Under our present social-security system we favor Mr. Doolittle and penalize Mr. Tryhard. Mr. Tryhard has worked hard all of his life at moderate wages. He took his duties as a husband, father, and citizen seriously. He bought a modest home through the building and loan, and through the years deprived himself and his family of many pleasures in order to meet the payments on that home. He gave his children an education. He never at any time in his life had to go to the township trustee for aid. He reached the age of 65 broken in health, with no income except that from his garden and chickens. His little home was all paid for and clear of mortgages. He filed for old-age assistance. The investigator deducted from his food account the income derived from his garden, eggs, and chickens. He was forced to reduce his $1,000 insurance policy to $250. He was forced to mortgage the little homestead and pay 3-percent interest.

Mr. Doolittle arrived at the age of 65 and applied for oldage assistance. He never did an honest day's work in his life. He took the attitude that the world owed him a living. He married young and brought up a large family. None of them was able to give any assistance. Henry was a W. P. A. boss; John was on the Resettlement farms; Jim joined the Army;

Joe was a timekeeper; and poor Tom was on the penal farm. The girls were all married, but they did not do so well. Jane was doing better than the others. She was supervisor on a sewing project since she got her divorce. Since Mr. Doolittle had no property, no income, and no source of income, he was recommended more money per month than Mr. Trybard.

In the State of Indiana the average amount for old-age assistance is $16.39. The lowest county receives an average of $7.46. The highest county receives an average of $24.66.

Let us give our old people, all of them, a liberal pension without any strings to it, at no more cost to the taxpayer. Let us do away with the hundreds of thousands of dollars we are spending for useless help and give that money to our old folks instead. Our old people want security and peace. They do not want to be upset every 6 months by a Government reinvestigation to see whether or not they have gotten rich from their allowance during the last 6 months. Let us stop the Government from going any further into the real-estate business. We must assure our old people a just pension for all, instead of the grossly unfair and unjust assistance they are now receiving.

I believe in a pay-as-you-go plan for old-age security. A revenue tax of one-half to 2 percent, given our old people over 60 years, will increase buying power and help employ our idle millions. These people must be American citizens. They must spend it every 30 days for American-made and American-grown products. They must retire from any gainful pursuit.

The 1 percent gross-income tax in Indiana has provided $700 per teacher in salaries of nearly 20,000 teachers. It has permitted the State of Indiana to match the county units of government dollar-for-dollar on welfare costs. It has reduced the property tax one-third in our State. The gross-income tax is not passed on to the consumer.

A revenue tax of this kind in the State of Indiana will produce $73,500,000 per year. The number of old people that would be eligible is approximately 200,000. If all of them decided to retire from their jobs, they would receive $30.50 the first month. As business increases, their amount will increase. This pension will give three square meals a day to 8,000,000 families in America. This plan will establish better markets for our farmers, abolish poorhouses, eliminate a large percent of the crime in our Nation, strengthen religious organizations and do away with much unemployment.

Public opinion has decreed that the old-age pension is here to stay. Taxes will be collected in every community, and the money will come back to every community. Everyone will be guaranteed an old-age pension policy at the age of 60

We have appropriated billions for battleships, millions for dams, Government-owned power plants, wildlife and soil conservation. We guard the flying geese and ducks and we protect the mineral wealth under our ground. I believe it is time we started to conserve human beings, to make life comfortable for our old folks, and at the same time make life secure for our younger people by making them certain of jobs, plenty of food, and the comforts of life.

All we ask is that you give this plan a trial for 1 year. If you believe our old people should have $30 to $50 per month, vote for this bill. If you believe they can exist on $6 to $26 per month, vote it down.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Bolles].

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Chairman, since the beginning of civilization there have been three great motivators of the human race, (1) obtaining power, (2) accumulation of wealth, and (3) the abolition of poverty.

The most stupendous task in this world is the abolition of poverty. It cannot be done by the system that demands that, because we cannot, or are not all rich, we should all be poor. This tremendous work cannot be done in a generation. It cannot be accomplished by mere homilies. It must begin with the child. This bill is but a step toward that goal. Its benefit is not alone for the aged; it is to make a place for the youth. The underprivileged, whether from morals or finances or physical defects, environment, or heredity, call aloud to us and demand a share of the profits we have made in placing each in a way for independence as against dependency. We need to turn some of these profits we are permitted to make into a profitable investment in humanity. Into the port of missing girls each year sail 80,000 of our daughters. They seldom are found and few return.

The greater the spread of prosperity the greater need there is for the abolition of poverty. In making profits we have also lessened but not defeated poverty.

Tremendous things demand accomplishment. poverty with us yet. Poverty will never be eliminated by charity. It will never be abolished by giving gifts. Poverty is not always a crime. Poverty is a reflection on all of us. We have fallen down somewhere in the building of the social organization. We have resolved and theorized and gone to sleep. We see children brought into the world and thrown in the ashpit of moral degeneracy and financial restrictions and give the family a sack of oatmeal through the poormaster or a ton of coal from the associated charities or a job on W. P. A. We hand the illiterate and starving a printed formula for thrift and uplift. We give a dinner with swelling chest to stuff the body of the poor while the soul is starving. We try to be charitable and only feed cupidity, permit the soul to atrophy and imperil our citizenship. We make professional paupers by writing checks for funds of which we know nothing for certain. We spend a part of the profits each year to aid the incapable who resent it. We waste millions on highly paid experts who have a new scheme each day to regenerate someone who does not need it or ask it. There are wandering boys and wayward girls to save while there is yet time.

For these we must vote as for the older people. We cannot look upon this bill as for the aged alone, but as clearing a highway for younger people into gainful operations.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Houston].

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, the United States is the stronghold of democratic government which in some lands has failed to meet the needs of the people, and that failure has resulted in the setting up of dictators. To avoid dictatorship, we must make democracy work here, and the best manner in which that can be accomplished is through the steady expansion of private enterprise.

America has been endowed by nature with unexcelled natural resources and we can produce within our boundaries more of the things we need than any other nation in the world. We have the men, the knowledge, the skill, and the resources to produce much more than we are now producing.

Our problem is to find the policies and the program that will assure a strong and steady flow of capital into the stream of commerce and trade, and a pay-as-you-go plan for old-age security such as H. R. 6466 will provide a pension of $50 or more to all eligible persons more than 60 years of age, enable our elderly people to live in a dignified manner befitting an American citizen, create new markets, increase employment in industry, enable young workers to take the places of those retired, eliminate the present costly and unsatisfactory relief system, and restore prosperity.

Early in 1935, when I first came to the House of Representatives, I introduced a bill to pay $50 per month to single persons and $70 per month to couples living together, but that bill was accorded no consideration as the Social Security Act was favored by the administration. About that time the revised McGroarty bill, H. R. 7154, approved by the Townsend organization, was introduced and I voted to substitute it for the Social Security Act. H. R. 4199 followed, then H. R. 2, then H. R. 6378, and finally H. R. 6466, which is before the House of Representatives and for which I am voting.

In addition to these bills, there is H. R. 5620, sponsored by the General Welfare Federation, which is a carefully prepared measure, and for which I have just received petitions signed by residents of the Fifth Congressional District of Kansas, as follows:

Sadie Sharp, Mulvane, Kans., and 29 others.

Mrs. Neva Hutchinson, 1310 East Central, Wichita, Kans., and 59 others.

C. W. Glennie, 408 East Eleventh Street, and 29 others. Edgar Brassier, 351 Lulu Avenue, Wichita, Kans., and 89 others.

Mrs. Jane Brumfield, Wichita, Kans., and 59 others.

A. D. Barton, 811 East Harry Street, Wichita, Kans., and 89 others.

During the past 5 years I have received thousands of letters from people of my district urging the enactment of a Federal old-age pension law, and it is my sincere hope that a majority of the House membership will join me in voting for H. R.

6466, which is designed to repay in a measure the debt we owe to our old folks and at the same time restore prosperity throughout the land.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. Cannon].

Mr. CANNON of Florida. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, I have listened with great interest to this debate today regarding H. R. 6466, and it was a matter of great disgust to me to hear so many of the opponents of this bill flaunting themselves before this membership today as "saviors of our country," despite the fact that they have offered no constructive reason or reasons why they oppose the bill in question.

Some Members who oppose this legislation have spoken on this floor as gentlemen should, while others have played the role of character assassins, scandalmongers, and resorted to villification generally, while still others of a more suave type have "toyed" with the matter and have been given to satire and ridicule of a minor nature. But it is interesting to note that everyone who has spoken from the floor today has realized the necessity of a plan for the aged offering more security to our unfortunate elders above the age of 60, who would retire from a gainful occupation.

America for the past 10 years has become more pension and relief conscious as a result of the advent of the machine age, which has stripped us of the utility of our manpower. This Congress has voted many millions of dollars for relief and semi-relief agencies. Just recently we voted $100,000,000 for W. P. A. relief; too much of which amount, it is said, will be spent administering the relief funds and too much likewise will be given to nonrelief clients, and too much will probably be given to those who do not deserve or need any relief funds. Most of which eventualities are beyond the control of this Congress or any other Congress. It is obvious to me that where relief is so broad in its scope and so far-reaching in its effect, it is humanly impossible to rid the entire program of most of its inconsistencies and misgivings. Yet, I am proud to confess that I voted for, on every occasion, the larger amounts in the order of their appearance on the floor of this Congress. I did so believing that this country owes its all, if necessary, to suffering humanity within our territorial confines. We are told now that more funds will have to be appropriated for a continuation of our necessary relief program. I shall support any measure in that direction. No one can deny, however, that every penny of money so appropriated comes from the General Treasury, depleting the General Treasury and never to be returned thereto. Under the operation of the plan known as H. R. 6466 the funds with which to operate the law are to be raised by a definite tax levy, clearly defined and classified, and the relief under the effect of this bill will not cost this Government one cent. Some of the Members have obviously confused this form of taxation and have presumed that this tax is to be heaped upon and added to the present tax system under which we now labor; but I would advise this Congress that this plan proposes to replace and displace the other relief structures and is operated under a pay-as-you-go plan. It has been stated by several speakers today that the operation of this plan would bankrupt the Government, and I say to you in all sincerity that it would not cost this Government one penny; but I do say that continuation of W. P. A. and other relief agencies, all of which, unfortunately, are necessary, will bankrupt this Government. But if the erroneous assertion that this bill would by its operation bankrupt this Government were true, I know of no other force having a right to bankrupt its own country than the people of this country. and I am definitely certain that some measure must be passed by this Congress looking toward the relief of the elders of this country, who are not employed and who will never be employed in this life unless such relief is had. And since our elders today are the youth of yesterday I cannot see why we question their right to live in the pursuit of happiness with the enjoyment of the necessary things in life, because without them, obviously, we would not be a country today.

For the few reasons above set out I ask this House to support H. R. 6466. And if time permitted there are many other reasons which I could enumerate.

To those of you who conscientiously oppose this measure I invite your further and more studious consideration, and to those of you who resort to vulgarity, stupidity, ridicule, and misrepresentation I offer my sympathy.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Florida [Mr. Peterson] such time as he may desire.

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this bill. I want to compliment my colleague from Florida [Mr. Hendricks] for his untiring efforts on behalf of the aged of our State. There are some Members who are not definitely pledged to this bill but are in favor of more liberal pensions. I ask you today to support this measure in order that the aged of your respective States may have more liberal pensions and in order that red tape may be slashed.

I sent out a questionnaire asking how the aged in certain counties in my district would spend the money in the event this bill would pass. I shall not attempt to analyze in detail those statements, but suffice it to say that practically every type of professional or business man would get the benefit of such spending.

This bill, H. R. 6466, introduced by Representative Hendricks, of Florida, takes the place of H. R. 2 and is known as the Townsend plan.

Whether one sits in his office or whether one goes through his district, he cannot help seeing the plight of the aged of the Nation. Many of them, through no fault of their own, are destitute. Many of them are dependent upon their children, kinspeople, and neighbors, who are making sacrifices to assist them-sacrifices which they are glad to make, yet in many instances those same sacrifices may make them skimp on the education or even food and clothing of their own children. The passage of this bill helps not alone the aged but it helps the youth of the Nation, and it helps business and professional men. As a matter of curiosity, or maybe not so much curiosity itself but an actual desire to ascertain how the money would be spent, I sent out questionnaires. I enumerated some of the items for which the money would be spent in a previous talk which I made on the floor, and I referred to some of these items before the hearings in the Ways and Means Committee. I will not go into detail here, but I will state generally that merchants, automobile dealers, radio dealers, oculists, doctors, dentists, painters, carpenters, libraries, farmers-practically every business or profession would get the benefit of the expenditures made by the aged. The passage of this bill also will eliminate many local taxes for the upkeep of old people's homes, county farms, and so forth-places where in many instances the upkeep is out of proportion to the benefit to the aged. It will eliminate the necessity of State levies to meet the present old-age pension system. It will eliminate the dual system, which has so much red tape-investigations and reinvestigations. There will be a degree of definiteness about this pension when a person is adjudged to be entitled to it.

I would remind the Members of this House that it is not a mandatory $200 pension, as many have been led to believe. Whatever the tax brings will be distributed to the beneficiaries under this plan. Many criticisms of the plan have been due not to provisions in the bill itself but to what someone may have said, or misconstructions of what someone may have said, or false issues creeping into the consideration. Two direct objectives—one, the assistance to the aged of the Nation; the other, to place dollars in the channels of commerce-may be materially sped along the way by your support of this legislation. Some have said, "I'm not for this particular bill, but I'm for more liberal pensions." Even if you were not for this plan from the start, if you are an advocate of more liberal pensions, I ask that you cast your vote for same. My support has been of long duration, but whether you have been for it for that long or not, here is your chance to vote for the aged, for the young, for the Townsend plan, for more liberal pensions, and against red tape and delays.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. Pierce].

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, the bill before this Committee of the Whole, H. R. 6466, is the outgrowth of human needs and the expression of both hope and fear. Somewhere in our path through the jungle of these difficult transition years we should have found a bypath which might better be traveled by our dependent ones—the very young and the aged. We should have set their feet on pleasanter and safer paths. We must now do all possible to allay the fears and meet the hopes and expectations of those who look to us for aid.

It is not strange that this matter of old-age annuities should have become almost a religion with millions of people. In any period the idea and the demand would have spread swiftly. Now conditions are ripe for its full flowering and fruition. The people have caught the vision. Government prodigality has made it clear that there are vast money resources which can be reached by those who have the will to find them, and can be divided among those who insistently demand a share.

In this hour of reckoning I take satisfaction in recalling that some things have been done by this administration toward social security and the democratization of our vast wealth resources. We have, for the first time in our history, acknowledged certain responsibilities as a nation for the welfare of our handicapped, underprivileged, and helpless people. Unfortunately, the provisions for old age have lagged and the realization of such benefits as have been provided has been too long deferred.

I deeply regret that this Congress has not taken cognizance of the situation and met the need and the demand by carefully considered legislation worked out in committee by experienced legislators who could have used, as a framework, the bills which have been so universally acceptable to those in whose behalf the legislation is sought. There have lately been two national groups devoted to this single and pressing problem. Each has advanced some plans and ideas fundamental to such legislation. Certain theories and requirements have been widely acclaimed only to go into the discard later. This is clear evidence that a harmonization was needed, adapted to our usual legislative procedure. The fact that this bill, lately recast, is before us for acceptance or rejection without amendment, as discussion may develop such need, rules out any and all reasons for argument as to its details. The goal toward which we have pressed in the cause of democracy was not only that such a bill should be reported out from committee for consideration on this floor, but, also, that the Members of this House might lend aid toward enactment of such legislation. We are working at cross-purposes. Those who desire that Congress shall share in shaping old-age pension legislation are disappointed in the procedure. There are many alternatives which have now and then been suggested and at times incorporated in the legislative setting of this plan. They should be open to acceptance or rejection by the Nation's lawmakers. We have had years to shape and mold old-age pension legislation, but we have left it to private agencies.

It is amazing and gratifying that the voices of our people can be raised in unison to such strength that they can be so unmistakably heard in this Chamber where the whispers of the powerful have sometimes reverberated like thunder. The support of this bill has not come from the powerful ones of our social organization, those who luxuriously foster "moral rearmament" and would save the Nation by a slogan have had no great banquets over old-age pensions nor have there been broadcasts by our royalty or near royalty for this bill. It has sprung from the hearts of people who know want and misery. During the growth of the movement millions have been meeting in every city and countryside to talk about Government affairs. This has resulted in a widespread permanent interest in all that makes for the general welfare and the preservation of democracy. The response by Government is a real test of democracy.

I believe the demand for security in old age is a reasonable one. Those in my State who are making it are our stable citizens who have met the tests of citizenship in political and social life. They have for the most part been hard-working, kindly, self-respecting people, helpful to friends and neighbors and generous in support of a good cause. There must be a solution of their present problems which is entirely consistent with self-respect.

I have, for years, advocated old-age pensions and included such a plea in a Governor's message. Since that time conditions have grown steadily worse for the average man and woman. Our relief load in Oregon is now as great as was the total State budget when I was Governor. Under our economic development wealth has been channeled into fewer hands. The automobile, and the gas to run it, drains money with great rapidity to the Atlantic seaboard. No solution has been found for the problem of redistribution of that wealth. The uncertainties of jobs, wages, and of returns from efforts put into farming and other producing occupations have been made manifest. Savings have been exhausted. A wave of thrift-teaching propaganda led to small accumulations of money which were lost through wicked and ruthless exploitation by financial brigands who ran the banks and holding companies, and laughed at blue-sky laws and State or national regulation. Interest rates have made it impossible to live from returns on any small capital which has survived the craftily organized raids of "investment bankers." I want to say that the "loss of confidence" in business so much talked about in hearings and the press is not due entirely to legislation or Government activities but comes from a lesson learned in the "school of hard knocks." Savings henceforth will be kept in banks because we have made them safe, but they will not soon be entrusted to the Wall Street manipulators of East or West. Sons and daughters can just manage to keep homes going for their younger dependents. What in heaven's name is left for a person to count on if he is to live to what we used to call a good old age?

Action cannot wait on recovery because that will be so gradual it cannot be timed. I cannot agree with my friends who talk so glibly about recovery. As I look toward the future I cannot see anything that indicates a return to the good old times of the past when jobs were plentiful for all who desired them. Instead of recovery there must be a readjustment to new conditions. We have accepted the idea of Government subsidies, of control and intervention, of made work under W. P. A., of loans and grants of numberless sorts. Charles Beard, in his fine new work, America in Mid-Passage, tells how the press regarded proposed agricultural legislation in 1927. He says, "Metropolitan editors seemed unable to explain the phenomenon save in terms of agrarian fanaticism-as a mental disease." This was 12 years ago. Now the Congress votes over a thousand million dollars for activities along that line. So in years to come our successors in these seats will take for granted what we now struggle to secure and some people ridicule. We must eventually accept shorter hours of labor in industry. We must yield to Government ownership of natural monopolies and total intolerance of private monopoly.

Yes, we must progress.

No one knows how many people might be retired from wage earning by such an annuity as is now proposed. It assuredly would not retire the most competent, who receive wages beyond the amount which could be realized under this or any similar act. Machinery, which has been of so much benefit to humankind, has nevertheless destroyed millions of jobs. Our marvelous increase of national wealth has been accompanied by increase of slums, by general financial insecurity, and total inability, so far, to readjust our economic life to the new conditions under which we must live. If an assured, though small, income can tempt into retirement four or five millions now gainfully employed, there will be room in the work world for nearly half the employables now at the door, begging for work. No one knows just what would happen under this proposed bill, but no one can deny that many of our plans for 10 years have proven failures, and that we seem to be casting about for another solution without much well-developed planning and with diminishing confidence. Why not establish an old-age annuity plan and take such economic byproducts as it may afford?

When the tragic days of 1929 shocked us into realization of our economic situation, we had developed in America what we called the American standard of living. It was higher, more expensive, more enjoyable than any previously developed anywhere at any time in human history. The American standard of living meant education for Kate and John beyond the ordinary school. It meant better clothes than anywhere else worn; it meant the telephone, automobile, better food. It meant running water, the bathtub; the care of doctors for health, eyes, and teeth. It meant making the world a lovely, intensely interesting place in which to live. The subsistence standard of living to which millions have been relegated means no higher education for the children. It means the denial of the accustomed pleasures and of those inventions which have become necessities—the automobile, the radio, the telephone, and the electric light. It means illhealth, stunted bodies, undeveloped minds, bitter hearts. It is estimated that two-thirds of our people have today income sufficient only for this subsistence standard of living.

We devised the W. P. A. as an emergency measure. I know how bitterly any criticism of this agency is resented by some of its beneficiaries of both high and low degree. We do not know all about its administration, as it is what one of our Oregon editors calls "an untouchable secret society." We had to have some such thing, but such a travesty on the worker's life must not be made permanent. It is certainly better to have work relief than to extend poor relief and to accept in a democracy a class of recipients of public charity who may become powerful in determining who shall be the leaders of government. I fear the permanent extension of both these temporary expedients. I desire to help to form a plan for an organized society without poverty and its attendant crime and misery. Believing a plan for old-age annuities will bring us any nearer that goal, I am willing to try it.

My neighbors and friends who have for 5 or more years struggled to spread knowledge of this pension idea and to secure its enactment into law are just as much interested in our country as are those who ignore the necessity for something new and different. They know something of the labor situation, which is certainly appalling.

We have now approximately 33,000,000 gainfully employed workers. In our most prosperous year, 1929, there were gainfully employed 36,100,000 workers. Ten years later, this year, 1939, we have at least 10,000,000 unemployed workers. 1937, the most prosperous year of this administration, there were employed 35,000,000, only 1,100,000 less than were employed in 1929. Still in 1937 over 7,000,000 men and women were unwillingly out of work. Available jobs have increased since 1929, but seekers of jobs have increased at a much greater rate.

In 1929 we had a labor force of 37,700,000, with 36,100,000 employed, leaving 1,600,000 out of work. In this year, 1939, our labor forces increase to 43,000,000, but there are jobs for only 33,000,000 workers. At the bottom of the depression, in March 1933, we had a labor force of 40,000,000, but only 27,700,000 jobs. That was the peak of the unemployment, 12,300,000 idle. Had our business activity increased in the same ratio as the demand for jobs, there would have been 5,000,000 more jobs in 1939 than 10 years earlier, but instead of increase of jobs they shrank by 3,000,000 and more. Next year it will be worse, for another half a million boys and girls will arrive at an age where they demand their places in the working world. Does this augur security?

The figures on unemployment, which I have quoted from a recent issue of the United States News, are to me astonishingly convincing proof that we must work toward reorganization of our economic life so that all may find jobs. We cannot expect better conditions to develop out of the present situation without definite effort, through legislation, to direct forces toward breaking down barriers which block the way to opportunity. Every capable young person has a right to expect a chance to earn money and establish a comfortable place in society. It is very evident that there must be some new line of attack on the battle front of unemployment. We need genuine planning-how the word has been abused!-including not only old-age pensions, shorter hours of labor, public works, C. C. C. camps, but also farm security, which will attract people to agriculture as an occupation, and a revival of world trade, which will provide consumers for what is produced. Those who help to formulate legislation for permanent prosperity will always keep in mind the fact that private industry is dependent upon consumption by well-paid wage earners.

The causes of our economic disaster have been analyzed many times, and I set forth my own ideas recently before the Ways and Means Committee in the hearings on this bill. I shall not here repeat that statement. I am arguing only for tolerance toward and consideration of a remedy which sees to millions of good Americans, yes, grass-root Americans, feasible and just. Our Oregon Legislature memorialized Congress for action on the general-welfare plan. A majority of 34,070 out of a total vote of 333,492 called for that memorial. I, therefore, support their plea that this House give serious consideration to the proposal for an old-age annuity.

We have voted millions and yielded judgment time and again for palliatives. We have followed economists and social workers of many conflicting schools of thought, each group being publicized for the time being as so flawless that wisdom would die with them. Now we might do well to listen to the common man.

Mr. Chairman, the following is a statement I made before the Committee on Ways and Means on the subject of oldage pensions:

STATEMENT OF HON. WALTER M. PIERCE, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF OREGON

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, have written what I want to say. I know how hard it is to read a document and make people understand, but I don't want to be misquoted, and I would like to read the document through, and if there are questions may they be reserved until I have finished reading?

Mr. Cullen. We are going to grant you that privilege. You want to proceed with your statement without interruption, and then after your statement is completed the members of the committee after your statement is completed the members of the committee may ask you questions. Is that satisfactory to you?

Mr. Pierce. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Cullen. How much time do you want?

Mr. Pierce. Twenty minutes, perhaps.

Mr. Cullen. Proceed.

Mr. Pierce. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on November 8, 1938, the people of Oregon passed under the initiative an act calling for a national convention to propose a constitutional provision for the Townsend national-recovery plan. There were provision for the Townsend national-recovery plan. There were 183,781 votes for that act; contrary, 149,711. The majority for the act was 34,070.

Pursuant to that act the Oregon Legislature, by unanimous vote, passed a memorial which I presented to the United States House of Representatives on January 30, and copy of which is attached to these remarks. In order that members of this committee may be accurately informed in regard to the desires of the people of Oregon as expressed by popular vote, I quote herewith the initiative act which was passed, and upon which the memorial was based:

"The Legislature of the State of Oregon is hereby authorized and directed to make application to the Congress of the United States."

directed to make application to the Congress of the United States not later than March 1, 1939, for the calling by the Congress, pursuant to the provisions of article V of the Constitution of the United States, of a national convention for proposing an amendment to the said Constitution to provide for the establishment and operation of the philosophy and principles of the Townsend national recovery plan, otherwise known and described as the proposed General Welfare Act of 1987."

posed General Welfare Act of 1937."

The Oregon State Planning Board has recently issued a report called "Oregon Looks Ahead." From press notices issued by the planning board, I quote an extract germane to this discussion:

"The real reason why Oregon is one of the strongholds of the Townsend old-age pension movement may be found in an Oregon State Planning Board report Oregon Looks Ahead, it is pointed out by compilers of the volume. This State has more people over 54 years of age in proportion to its population than any other State in the Union except Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont. No inferences regarding the Townsend or any other movement are drawn in the report, but it would only be natural for any project of interest to older people to arouse attention here, those who have read the volume point out."

Indicative of the attitude of both old and young in Oregon is the Indicative of the attitude of both old and young in Oregon is the petition addressed to Congress by Townsend Club No. 1, of Baker, Oreg., which I desire to bring to the attention of this committee by incorporating it in my statement. The facts set forth in this petiincorporating it in my station are incontrovertible:

That great sums have been spent to overcome the depression.

That due to labor-saving machines, many now unemployed will never again find regular work in industry.

The petition then states that there are 25,000.000 people in the States who are hopefully looking toward the enactment of United States who are hopefully looking toward the enactment of the Townsend plan.

This is the position of the people who voted at the general election in Oregon for the legislative memorial. My neighbors and friends of over half a century in Oregon are among the voters and petitioners. They say, in effect, "It is now 10 years since the crash; Congress has made no headway toward economic stability; it has offered no remedy, formulated no policy; its vast expenditures have effected no permanent change and established no satisfactory precedents. We offer a plan in which we have confidence. We ask Congress to hear our arguments and give consideration to our plan, which has millions of adherents." This is in accordance with democratic traditions and procedure.

It is a satisfaction to me to know that the Ways and Means Committee of this House is holding extended hearings and will consci-

I wish to make clear to you the very earnest and definite desire of an impressive majority of Oregon citizens and to add comments on the situation and some of the causes of the changed attitude toward Government and the plainly apparent distrust of Congress and State legislatures so far as social legislation is concerned.

THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

I was much gratified to have this administration undertake the preparation of a social-security measure. This Nation has been

I was much gratified to have this administration undertake the preparation of a social-security measure. This Nation has been laggard in social-security legislation, possibly because we were utterly unable to realize that our country would soon face the unemployment, poverty, and confusion which long ago drove some European countries to old-age pensions.

Our Social Security Act was too hastily drawn, though thoroughly idealistic. It reflected the Nation's inexperience and unpreparedness, but it for the first time put this Government into proper protective relation toward its people. The stupendous task of getting it into operation appears to me to have been done in a creditable manner. I rejoice in the provisions for aid to the handicapped and for child welfare. I believe in unemployment insurance, but I have come to the conclusion that part of the fabric needs to be rewoven. The Social Security Act, so far as it relates to unemployment, should be amended with the advice of those who have struggled to comply with its provisions and remain solvent in business in order to meet the pay-roll taxes for unemployment insurance. I know that this committee will study very carefully the proposed amendments to the Social Security Act.

No Member of Congress who supported the present act has any right to call the Townsend plan "fantastic" in the light of the actual financial results of the collection of unemployment-insurance.

actual financial results of the collection of unemployment-insurance funds. Certainly it is utterly "fantastic" for a government, on one hand, to collect from its citizens a reserve of $47,000,000,000 while, on the other, it throws into the effort to bring back prosperity billions of dollars of accumulated debt. Any person who faces that ultimate $47,000,000,000 reserve accumulation and the method in which it is being handled should be exceedingly humble and certainly reluctant to accuse any other group of offering "fantastic" propositions.

A guiding point which I believe should always be held in mind is A guiding point which I believe should always be held in mind is that the money collected for social security in any of its activities should be returned as quickly as possible to the people and not accumulated in the National Treasury. It should be a speedy collection and distribution process, with the least possible expense for collection and with the quickest and widest possible distribution.

I believe this committee should face the facts as they are, and should determine on a pay-as-you-go policy. It is neither fair nor right to borrow money on the credit of future generations for current, present-day needs which are not emergency but which will right to borrow money on the credit of future generations for current, present-day needs which are not emergency but which will always be part of our social system. Such needs should be met from present-day income. We should feed and clothe the underprivileged and care for the aged with funds collected from those who are enjoying the bounty of the present day and system. Our Government has collected under title 8 of the Social Security Act and paid into the general fund $995,207,036, and Congress has already appropriated for the reserve account of the old-age pension fund approximately $1,125,000,000. Our industries have paid into the Federal funds under the unemployment-insurance levy $1,499,000,000 in round numbers. This last amount has earned $30,000,000 in interest charged our Government. This does not appear to me to justify the methods used. Collect what we must collect and pay it out promptly to those for whom it is collected.

The old-age pension provisions of the Social Security Act seem

The old-age pension provisions of the Social Security Act seem to have been proven quite definitely inadequate. If they had been otherwise, the Townsend movement and other movements looking therwise, the Townsend movement and other movements looking toward real security for the aged would not have gained such momentum. It seems to me to be the reaction against an inadequate Government plan which has caused people to turn elsewhere for the leadership in the matter of caring for the aged.

I do affirm, however, that the very fact of establishment of a cooperative State and National system of monthly payments to the needy and of a contributory pension plan had been beneficial in these trying times.

CAUSES BACK OF THE DEMAND

I shall now briefly mention some of the factors contributing to I shall now briefly mention some of the latest some the bitterness, restlessness, and discontent plainly apparent among our people, and probably creating the state of mind which was expressed in the vote of the Oregon initiative measure, and is shown in the demand made upon Congress to enact into law the proposals which are coming from the people. Only if you think you can remove these causes can you conscientiously disregard the demand for a decent old-age pension.

Do you ask why this sudden necessity for pensions for the aged, why they do not save for old age, why they do not depend upon their children? These questions are easily answered. The margin in today's earnings is too narrow to allow savings for old age. The children are carrying all the burden possible if they provide for themselves and their children. The story is told when we recall that two-thirds of our people actually live below the deadline of comfortable existence.

Formerly the little savings for old age could be lent for 6 or 8 percent interest, providing an income. We all know this is no longer possible. Much of the old-age poverty during the past decade resulted from so-called investments in worthless stocks and decade resulted from so-called investments in worthless stocks and bonds. This hazard has, to some extent, been eliminated by the enactment of the S. E. C. law. People in a little rural county in Oregon lost a half million of savings through manipulations of one utility holding company. It is said that through one conspicuous figure now operating in the utility world "investors" lost two hundred and fifty to three hundred million dollars—more than the entire cost of the T. V. A. program to date and five times the cost of Bonneville to date. (Still these pirates choose when and whether they shall obey the S. E. C. law.) The old farm couple formerly moved to town and lived from farm rentals. Now farm prices are too low and taxes too like to provide a margin for comfortable noved to town and fived from farm rentals. Now farm prices are too low and taxes too high to provide a margin for comfortable living. The props have been knocked from under them. There is just one solution. A pension for old age. The Congress must provide the means and the method.

The Federal Government's policy with relation to middle-age and aged workers has been destructive. This administration is largely responsible for a rapidly growing emphasis on youth. Even largely responsible for a rapidly growing emphasis on youth. Even agencies supported by emergency funds are refusing to employ people over 60, apparently contrary to law, but they pride themselves on the fact that they are adopting civil-service methods. A robust man 60 or 65 years of age cannot be employed as a caretaker in a C. C. camp. The little rural post office which would seem an ideal place for an elderly person cannot be given to the charge of anyone over 66 years of age. The Farm Credit Administration sends out farm appraisers "not over 35." The Farm Security Administration confronts hard-pressed farmers with beardless youth—boys who have never struggled to support anyone or maintained a business, a farm, or a home.

Thus, to inexperienced youth are entrusted decisions which

Thus, to inexperienced youth are entrusted decisions which should be made by experienced, capable men and women. The W. P. A. has thrown off workers over 65, forcing them to take relief or pensions when they could do better jobs than younger men. This tendency has been carried to cruel extremes.

I can understand that the Civil Service must have some age limits because of the necessity of accumulating pension funds, but why our Government must be run by college boys I have not been why our Government must be run by college boys I have not been able to understand. One of these young men who was a "master" and on the way to being a "doctor" rejected a public-works application for a project in my town. He told me that he had learned through a series of graphs that the section was on the road to oblivion and a town of 10,000 would be abandoned. A study of his table showed that taxes had not been paid for 5 years as promptly or as fully as they had previously been paid, therefore, the community was disintegrating, people were leaving it permanently. The truth of the matter was that a change in penalties in the State tax law had taught the farmers it was cheaper to have the county tax law had taught the farmers it was cheaper to have the county carry the taxes than borrow to pay them. Anyone who had ever had responsibility for taxes would have understood this.

We have taught all classes of our population to come to the Gov ernment for subsidies and hand-outs. Everybody is doing it.
Every group numerous enough to form a lobby has been successful in dipping into the Treasury. This does not apply solely to the farmers and the unemployed. The railroads are now bawling for subsidies; the Maritime Board has handed out millions of public subsidies; the Maritime Board has handed out millions of public funds to owners or operators of ships; banks and insurance companies have been bolstered from R. F. C. funds—a hundred million here by airplane, ninety million bestowed there never to be completely repaid. The R. F. C. was really organized to unload on the public the obligations of railroads, insurance companies, and banks—to take care of the "big boys." The home-loan associations have been bailed out at public expense. "Lame ducks" and political hacks have been provided with luxurious living also at public expense. Pullman cars and airplanes are filled with people rushing to Washington for hand-outs. I don't think the aged are the only ones who are looking to the Government. They are only the tail end of the procession.

If this agency had been wholly satisfactory and had applied to those actually in need every cent of its funds not necessary for the most economical administration, it is probable that thousands of people would never have admitted the necessity of a Government guaranty of old-age security. The recent threats to curtail jobs following a cut in requested appropriation have made most of us bitterly resentful of the attitude of officialdom. Does it startle you or frighten you to look upon the W. P. A. picture—October 1937, 1,432,910 workers; October of 1938, 3,125,990?

If we had evolved a permanent public-works policy to take up the slack and to provide for those thrown out of industry, we might not have faced this situation. You and I know that this is not a depression or a recession or just "hard times." We are in a new world, facing a new economic era. We have not now time to new world, facing a new economic era. We have not now time to dwell upon the causes, but we understand the results. If we had done more than to offer temporary expedients, we might well ask Townsend plan advocates to be patient until the economic situation was righted. W. P. A. and P. W. A. have not yet solved the problem of unemployment, but they are permanently with us.

A few weeks ago—September 6, 1938—the United States News devoted a full page to one of its striking charts showing that there are now 8,000,000 families in the United States facing starvation and 11,000,000 families fighting poverty, making a total of 19,000,000 families below the line of comfortable existence. Allowing 4½ for each family makes a total of 84½ million people, according to the pictogram of the United States News, that are demanding relief either from the starving line or the needy line, practically two-thirds of the population of the United States, and at least two-thirds of the voters. If organized, and voting as a unit, they can get what they want. They can even ruin and wreck the financial structure. Any plan which will end this is worth serious consideration.

The clamor to be on the Government pay roll and to be blanketed under the civil service without any real evidence of qualification is an indication of a trend which is dangerous. "Blanketed" is the right word, for here many may sleep forever on the job. There is in our civil-service system practically no requirement for increasing competency in order to be retained or advanced. It is not the merit system which it should be.

vanced. It is not the merit system which it should be.

Many new Government emergency agencies have been administering in a ruthless manner. New faces appear every few weeks because others have been shifted to better Government jobs. These people are practically public pensioners. With the clamor for Government jobs we may face a time when there will not be enough producers and wage earners to support our privileged classes—public employees, delinquents, defectives, young children, the handicapped, youth paid to attend colleges, and, finally and most reasonably, the aged. Our bureaucracy has forced farm foreclosures and evictions. Our bureaucracy is in part responsible for our difficulties. for our difficulties.

for our difficulties.

Now, if we could eliminate these factors, we might brush aside the plea of the aged for security. Since we cannot remove the causes of poverty and unemployment and assure plenty for old age, something must be done, not only for protection of the aged but for the protection of the rest of society. It is probable that never in our history have so many people participated in a movement for any particular legislation. If fallacies are apparent to you, point them out for the benefit of the millions interested. This movement cannot be ignored and should not be ridiculed. You must, by this time, have a pretty clear idea of how the proposed plan would function. That is, apparently, more than the framers of the Social Security Act accomplished before requesting Congress to enact their bill into law. Experience has taught us that all legislation is the result of compromise, so I hope that out of all the panaceas offered this committee will be enabled to make congress to enact their bill into law. Experience has taught us that all legislation is the result of compromise, so I hope that out of all the panaceas offered this committee will be enabled to make wise recommendations for the amendment of the social-security law and for adequate old-age pensions.

Along with the other causes which I have mentioned, the Townsend-plan movement has made the Nation old-age-pension conscious. I do not expect it to die away. We cannot hedge. We must face the issue. There must be satisfactory legislation. The "emergency" has become the "new era." We must have some clear-cut plan. It is your duty as a committee to find how we can economize without hurting the underprivileged, how we can pay our way, what we can throw overboard, and what new cargo we must take aboard. We can forget the highly privileged, if they will allow us to do so. Let us legislate for the underprivileged. This is a democracy. We must listen to the plea of the people and give their statements fair consideration. The millions look upon this plan as a satisfactory one for the dual purpose of economic recovery and security for the aged. I believe all their Representatives in Congress should have the bill before them reported out from your committee for general discussion.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HUNTER].

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I believe that my position on the Townsend bill, now before this House, is different from that of many of my colleagues, some of whom may regard the vote today as a means of keeping campaign pledges.

When I first came to this House as a Member, 21/2 years ago, it was as one who had not received the endorsement and help of Dr. Townsend and his organization. In my district, the Townsend-endorsed candidate in 1936 was a Republican. It is not going beyond the facts to state that the support given my opponent by Dr. Townsend and his organization was the most powerful independent opposition I had to overcome.

Under these circumstances, no one could have said during my first term that I was a Townsend candidate or that I owed the slightest obligation to the Townsend organization. However, I did come to Washington firmly convinced that it was one of my primary obligations to fight for a Federal old-age pension. My mind was open as to the type of bill that should be passed. I knew only that in Ohio we had experimented with State old-age pension legislation, and I knew from bitter experience that it was woefully inadequate.

I knew that particularly in our industrial centers it is absolutely impossible for most of those past middle age to hope for employment. I knew, from our own experience in bank failures and depression, that no one can assume that old-age may be made secure through savings. I soon learned also that our present social security law fails to protect practically as many as it protects and for this reason does not answer the problem.

My study of old-age pension legislation before Congress convinced me that the Townsend bill, of all the legislation presented and having any chance of passage, most nearly met the universal need. For this reason I became an advocate of this bill, and for this reason I gratefully accepted in the last election campaign support of organizations in my district who want this bill.

Since this is my position, I feel that I have the right to call upon those who accepted support of the Townsend organizations to make good upon their campaign pledges and vote for this bill.

There are a number of Members who accepted help from these organizations who so far have not taken a definite stand. I want to warn that there can be no fence straddling now. This is not a partisan issue and will not be decided by Democratic or Republican votes.

The issue is whether we, as Members, consider present State old-age pension legislation adequate. It is whether we consider that the Social Security Act covers everyone sufficiently to assure independence in old age. It is whether we accept responsibility for the thousands of men and women past 60 years of age who today have no way to pay rent, buy food, or enjoy the simplest comforts so needed in old age.

I am not worried about the added tax. A tax is intolerable only when it stifles business and demands beyond ability to pay.

By a distribution of money raised through this tax and by assuring that it will be spent to produce business, there is every right to believe that it will cause increases in employment and business that will more than offset the slight additional payments.

The opportunity given to those past 60 to retire from industry will make room for added thousands of young people who today can find no jobs.

We need not deceive ourselves by thinking that we are not already paying this tax. Money is found, and through taxes, hidden and otherwise, to support thousands upon thousands of persons on W. P. A., direct relief, and otherwise. The sad part of the situation as it is today is that many of those we are so supporting are young, active, able, and more than anxious to take their rightful place in the business or industrial world.

By opening up new opportunities, by taking from active employment those past 60 years of age, and by assuring a steady flow of business, this legislation will make it possible for these thousands of younger people to find employment. This legislation aims at a newer and saner classification of those who should work and those who have earned retirement. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to use to the gentleman from California [Mr.

VOORHIS].

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, the American people are confronted with a challenge—the like of which they have not had to meet since the period of the War between the States.

It is required in this hour that the representatives of the people have courage, vision, and judgment.

America's problem can be solved and it can be solved without resort to dictatorship and without suspension of any of the constitutional liberties upon the basis of which our Nation has grown great. But it will take sacrifice and the most sincere patriotism to accomplish this.

The leading economists are in agreement that the central problem of our day is to bring the flow of buying power into balance with the flow of goods and services. They are also in agreement that idle hoarding of bank deposits and other forms of money is one major cause of the failure of buying power to keep up with production.

All of us know that to keep our Nation at peace it is of the greatest importance for our home market to absorb the great bulk of our production so that we can be as free as possible of the necessity of entering the world struggle for markets, which is one of the major causes of war.

All of us know, too, that the two main outlets for increasing production upon which we used to rely, namely, westward expansion and rapid population growth are things of the past.

If our people are to have work and our farms and industries are to be prosperous, there is only one way in which the necessary demand for their goods and crops can be assured, and that is by doing away with poverty in America and raising the standard of living of our people.

We have thousands of producers who are eager and willing to produce an abundance of goods if only they could find markets to sell them in; and we have millions of needy people who want those goods but have not the money to buy them. So I say again our problem can be solved, and the job of Congress is to provide such improved distribution of buying power and such increased amounts of buying power as to bring our producers and consumers together in the market to the benefit of both.

In large part this problem must be solved by reform of our outworn and unconstitutional method of creating money, so that instead of leaving this vital economic function to the uncertain mercy of 15,000 separate banking institutions we shall bring money into circulation by governmental action in accordance with the demands of our economy and under the absolutely safe control of the principle of maintaining a dollar of stable buying power.

But in addition to that we must take measures to reduce hoarding, to provide a better distribution of buying power, and to reduce the number of job seekers while at the same time not reducing the number of people able to consume their share of our national wealth produced.

If we had a general Federal pension system paid as a matter of right to American citizens 60 years of age and beyond we would not only be providing a national insurance against the insecurity of age but we would also be reducing the necessity of attempted hoarding of income; and we would be creating the one class of people who more than any other deserves to be consumers without at the moment engaging in production.

It is impossible to work out a plan for the solution of America's economic problem—upon the solution of which the preservation of democracy, as we know it, may well depend—without including a general Federal pension system in that solution.

Never in all history has any great forward step been taken by mankind without great and prolonged opposition. Never have such reforms come in the first instance in perfect form or in the form that all could agree upon.

Today we are called upon to vote on a question as simple as this: Is the bill before us to be passed because it represents an earnest effort to establish the great, necessary, and unassailable principle of a national retirement pension system or is it to be defeated because the details of this particular measure are not 100 percent satisfactory to this or that Member?

I have thought long and hard over this question. I decided long ago that I would vote for this or any general pension measure if I could be convinced that its provisions were neither vicious nor dangerous. I decided to do this because of my belief in the fundamental necessity of the principle contained in such legislation.

On this basis I shall vote "aye" on H. R. 6466 which is before us.

There are things about the bill which I do not altogether like, such as the exemption of national banks from the taxes. But the main ones are some of the tax features, and at best the tax features of a bill as far-reaching as this one are not going to be lacking in the requirement of certain sacrifice. They could not be in the nature of the case, because the thing we are struggling to do is too big.

Evidently, however, this bill cannot affect either the Budget or the Nation's credit in any serious way. It cannot break the Treasury, as has been charged, for the total amount paid out is to be determined by the total amount taken in from the taxes levied by the bill.

I should like to explain that I am perfectly free to make up my own mind on this measure. I was opposed both times I ran for Congress by the Townsend organization. I am not bound by any pledges except the general pledge to do the best I could to get the best possible pension bill enacted into law.

In the past I made two main objections to the Townsend program. One was that I thought it was unfair to hold out hope of $200 a month pensions to people for I felt sure that such pensions could never be passed nor could they be possibly paid on the present level of national income. The other objection was to the transactions tax, which I feared would fall mostly on the poor people and on competitive as opposed to monopoly industries.

Neither of these objections applies to the bill before us. It is not a $200 measure; it does not have a transactions tax. And may I say here that, in my opinion, this bill is neither as good as its advocates claim it is nor anywhere near as bad as its opponents claim. Indeed, many of the objections raised against it are based on a misconception of what the bill provides and many of the arguments for it are arguments not for this bill but for a bill that might have been before us but is not.

The only sensible way to decide what to do is to analyze carefully the pros and cons of this particular measure—H. R. 6466. In broad outlines the bill is a very simple measure. It provides for gross income taxes of ½ percent on manufacturers, producers, and wholesalers, and 2 percent on other persons and other types of income. If an individual has income of less than $50 in any month he pays no tax in that month. The revenue from these taxes is to be used first for administrative expense and the balance is to be paid pro rata to all American citizens 60 years of age and beyond who apply for it and agree to retire from active work.

Clearly this is not a $200 a month pension measure. Neither was H. R. 4199 of the Seventy-fifth Congress, nor H. R. 2 of this Congress. One of the main differences between these bills and H. R. 11 has been that H. R. 11 frankly said it was not a $200 a month measure. In my humble judgment our people who will receive pensions if this measure passes will be fortunate if they receive $30 or $40 a month from it. But they will get that—or whatever they do receive—free and clear, as a matter of right and not as a matter of charity, which certainly is something gained. And the States are, of course, free to add to Federal payments if they choose.

And so Members who do vote for the measure should be careful not to claim they are voting their constituents a large pension; while those who vote against it should be equally careful not to hide behind the $200 a month bogeyman.

The tax in this bill, I am reliably informed, is the same tax that has worked successfully in the Hawaiian Islands for some years. While I should frankly have preferred other tax provisions, I am convinced that any objections to the taxes are definitely and rather decisively outweighed by the advantages to the Nation of the establishment of the principle of a Federal pension system.

I shall vote for this bill for a very simple reason. I frankly wish I were voting for the general-welfare bill, H. R. 5620, instead. But I shall vote for this bill because I believe it offers me the only chance I shall have at this session of Congress to register my vote for a cause and principle which must win out in America very soon.

That principle, of course, is the principle of using a general retirement pension system as a means not only of doing justice to the veterans of our national life but as one important means of bringing about the essential balance between America's power to produce and her power to buy and consume. I believe this type of measure is one of three or four essential parts of the solution of the problem of hoarded savings and idle buying power.

I cannot vote "no" on such a measure.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may need to the gentleman from California [Mr. TOLAN].

Mr. TOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill, H. R. 6466, formerly H. R. 2. Many economists and some of our country's brightest minds are in favor of the principles of this legislation while millions of our people are knocking at the doors of Congress for its enactment.

Supposedly the richest nation in the history of the world, we should be ashamed to admit that nearly all other nations lead us in old-age pensions. True we have the Social Security Act, but it is far from an equitable, uniform old-age pension law. By its provisions the Federal Government undertakes to match the States' grants up to $15 per month. There is only one State in the Union, California, that matches the $15 given by the Federal Government.

People in Arkansas eligible under these grants are receiving the insignificant sum of $8.99 per month; Georgia, $9.09; Mississippi, $4.79; New Mexico, $12.94; North Carolina $9.51; South Carolina, $10.66; and Vermont, $12.60. It cannot be that these elderly persons who paid taxes and helped make this country what it is today, but now in want, can possibly live respectably on such miserable, measly sums of money per month.

This legislation in general terms is what Dr. Townsend has worked and contended for during the past 10 years.

Oh, I know people have laughed at Dr. Townsend, but he has never let up with his great humane idea and today he has millions of followers and is stronger than ever before in this country. Well, they laughed at Lincoln, and some of Lincoln's Cabinet laughed at him, laughed at his old shawl and his great idea when he first suggested taking the chains of slavery from the backs of millions of people. One thing they can never take from Dr. Townsend and that is that his name will go down in American history honored and loved for making his country old-age pension conscious.

making his country old-age pension conscious.

What is this plan? First, to effect and maintain complete recovery in the United States and sustain this prosperity by a sufficient supply of purchasing power; secondly, to create a condition of employment assurance by replacing those over 60 now employed with younger workers who are walking the streets, thousands of them high-school and college graduates; thirdly, to create a retirement fund for each individual who can and does qualify upon reaching the age of 60.

"Where are we going to get the money?" This cry has echoed and reechoed down the ages when any measures for the welfare of the many instead of the few have been proposed. This question was not asked in 1917 and 1918 when we spent in about 17 months nearly $40,000,000,000. Twenty billions of it for shot and shell, death and destruction. Thousands of American boys are sleeping their eternal sleep beneath the soil of Flanders Field. Nine billion dollars were spent to feed the hungry and starving of Europe. But it is a different story when it is even mentioned that we should take care of the poor and aged of our own country.

I ask you, where does the money come from to pay nearly $2,000,000,000 a year for direct help, crime, and welfare work in this Nation? Where does the money come from to pay millions and millions every year to paint the lips and cheeks of the women of this country. This remark may not help me with the ladies, but it goes anyway. Where does the money come from to pay our terrible bills for cheating and killing each other? Where do the billions come from for automobiles, airplanes, and injuries and death that result from our speed mania? When we dare mention anything for father and mother and their old age we are laughed at.

Maybe I am old-fashioned, but I say to Congress that never since man was first created did a son or a daughter ever live to see the day that they regretted being good to father or mother. Never will any nation ever fall for taking adequate care of the aged and the helpless.

Dr. Townsend has, to my mind, one of the most humane and helpful ideas since Lincoln freed the slaves. It is not perfect; what measure of man is perfect? There is hope and love in the Townsend old-age pension plan.

But they tell us it is a crime for Dr. Townsend and his supporters to offer hope to the old folks of this country through an impracticable plan. Who knows today what will work and what will not work?

Is this plan practicable? I claim any plan is practicable which absorbs hundreds of thousands of indigent inmates of poor farms, poorhouses, and other charitable institutions, some supported by the city, county, State, and fraternal organizations. All of these people, at the age of 60, would come within the provisions of this bill removing a huge tax burden.

This plan would take the aged of this country, lonely and destitute, from the county poor farms and county hospitals and place them in their own homes. Do you not think they would be happier with their own cookstove, their own furniture, their own beds, and their own neighbors to talk to?

We can pass unanimously in the House and Senate a monetary plan that would prove useless and impracticable tomorrow. We think we know, but in these fast changing international times we know very little. Not one single individual ever died on account of hope, but rather from a lack of it. Hope is the white light burning in every human heart; the thought that we will be happier tomorrow than today. When that light goes out we are done, for life is such a difficult game and there are so many things over which we have no control—financial troubles, sickness, and death—but always high up in the blue skies, shines the silver star of human hope.

It seems to me that this legislation will lift the hearts and hopes of millions of our people. We need legislation that will be uniform throughout the United States and this bill does just this.

The most terrible words echoing and reechoing throughout the United States today are: "No; there is no work for you, you are too old, and we do not want any man over 40." This is a direct challenge to the Congress of the United States and it must be answered by us if this Nation is to survive.

I respectfully ask that you vote in favor of this bill, H. R. 6466.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. White].

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, it seems there is little opportunity for the supporters of this legislation to be heard. The time on both sides is under the control of the opponents of the bill, and when they take the floor they refuse to yield for any questions that may bring out the facts. So far it seems to have been a one-sided debate. We have been treated this afternoon to a Huey Long show by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Short] with a difference that Huey Long was a humanitarian and had a heart for the common man and was in favor of a liberal old-age pension.

Mr. DeROUEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I have only 2 minutes and cannot yield.

Mr. DEROUEN. I think the gentleman ought to yield, inasmuch as he spoke about Huey Long.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The opponents of this constructive legislation, as always, when they cannot meet an argument, attempt to discredit the legislation by ridicule. In considering this legislation let us turn to the Constitution of the United States, embodying the principles on which this Government was founded.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The preamble states:

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

"Insure domestic tranquillity and promote the general welfare." Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Short] ridicule that? Is he opposed to security for old age? Who is more entitled to enjoy general welfare and domestic tranquillity than the men and women who by a lifetime of toil and effort have secured and presented to the succeeding generations all that this country of ours lavishes on its fortunate people?

The opponents of this legislation demand a perfect bill. They are loud in their protestations that the measure may, in its initial form, fail to provide for every class entitled to consideration.

If they are sincere in favoring old-age pension legislation, they will join us in voting for the passage of this bill as an initial step in a great constructive plan to bring about a new order in this country that will provide security for old age, eliminate hoarding, put money in circulation, and give employment to young men and women.

Let us replace the defective social security law that lays an undue burden on creative industry by taxing pay rolls. By passing this measure we will more evenly and justly distribute the expense of raising the money to provide for a national old-age pension which will be paid in full and direct to the beneficiary by the Federal Government, just as our soldiers' pensions are paid, eliminating dollar matching with States and local taxing unit, and insure that every person entitled to a pension will be placed on the roll. Let me remind the Members of the House that old-age pension is a settled policy with our Government. We provide retirement pay for the officers of the Army and the Navy, we pension our war veterans, and the host of Government employees. Are we to be more tender and more considerate with these easy-time Federal employees than we are with the veterans of the farms and factories that have devoted a lifetime of toil and effort to provide the good things we enjoy?

Let us pass this bill that will be the beginning of a great plan to provide for the fathers and mothers of this country now and for us when we have reached the age of retirement. Let us remove the fear of uncertainty and insecurity from the hearts of those facing their declining years; a time that must come to all of us. Let us no longer condemn the great majority of the people of this country to an old age of distress and poverty; let us at this late day carry out the great principles laid down in our Constitution "to insure domestic tranquillity," "promote the general welfare" for all the citizens of our great country that have reached the age of retirement that they may spend their declining years in ease, comfort, and security.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. White] has just referred very disparagingly to one of the best friends I ever had. I was reared with Huey Long. I spent a great part of my life with him until he died. I loved Huey Long and I honor his memory.

He has passed to his reward. I realize the remarks of men, irrespective of the forum where made, cannot dim the luster of his star nor lessen the love and respect of a grateful people in his beloved Louisiana. His voice is stilled, but his monument may be seen all over the State of Louisiana, and the name of Huey Long is engraven upon the hearts of a great people. As his friend and companion from high-school days to his untimely death, I am proud to stand here in this House and let the world know the deep and abiding friendship and affection which existed between us, and I am indeed sorry that the gentleman from Idaho referred to this serious debate on a most important subject as "a Huey Long show." This reference, Mr. Chairman, is not fair to the proponents of this legislation and neither is it fair to the memory of Huey Long.

It was not a show when he arose in the United States Senate and solemnly proposed his great humanitarian plan embodying a pension for our old people of $30 per month to come out of the United States Treasury, which principles are embodied in my pending bill. It was not a show when he revitalized and reenergized the State of Louisiana and made of it one of the most progressive States in the Union, nor when he eased the burdens of the poor and brought hope to aspiring youth.

Mr. Chairman, as his boyhood friend, I cannot be expected to do otherwise, sir, than to resent any man on this floor making any statement against my boyhood friend.

I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to have them follow the remarks of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. White] this afternoon. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DISNEY].

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, in discussing this proposition we must keep in mind that section 19 of the proposed bill repeals titles I, II, and VIII of the Social Security Act and destroys all of the set-up that we have organized under that act. Whether we like that act or not, whether we think it is perfect or not, it is doing plenty of good for the aged, and everyone knows that this bill is not going to pass this afternoon. We are following the widespread belief and demand that this is a measure that needs consideration by a record vote here, but the bill is not going to pass, and we all know it.

Our committees have been criticized for bringing this bill to the House in this form. This was the only way it could be done. If the Ways and Means Committee had made an unfavorable report it could not have been brought to the floor of the House. It is here and we think we have done our duty in so bringing it in. Such criticism is a smoke screen. If you want a record vote then this is the only system to that end. "Gag rule"? Yes. Dr. Townsend and other proponents of this bill not only ask for but demand a "gag rule," so as to shut off all amendments. They say they got a fair hearing before the Ways and Means Committee. They asked to have the bill brought to the floor. It is here. They asked for a "gag rule" and they got it.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

yield?

Mr. DISNEY. No; I am sorry, I have only a few minutes. Now, in order to keep the record straight, let us see what the goal is. The goal is $200 a month and as much more as rapidly as possible. This is the language of Dr. Townsend on page 647 of the record of the hearings, where he states:

I don't know whether that has been quoted as something indicating that I was deliberately trying to deceive the old folks or not. I am after that $200 a month and I am going to have it. I am going to stay after it until I overtake it.

This was shortly after he had admitted that this legislation has no chance to pass this House, and after he had announced that he was going to seek consolation in a constitutional amendment which he has since had introduced.

I quote from a popular newspaper in my district from an article entitled "Kidding the Old Folks." It reads in part as follows:

Pensions are popular; everybody wants them. Taxes are unpopular; nobody wants them. Of course there is not enough money for excessive pensions, and there never will be.

We are catering, if I may use the word in that way, to the wants of the people and not to the needs of the people. The appropriations for the expenses of this Government for 1916, since which time there has been no comparable increase in population, were $1,034,784,655, and this, the Seventy-sixth Congress, will pass appropriations running somewhere between nine and eleven billions of dollars. Have the needs of the Nation increased to that extent, or are we ministering to the wants instead of the needs of the people?

Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau, appearing before the Ways and Means Committee on May 27, 1939, suggested that the tax-raising and money-spending committees of the Senate and House should meet as a joint committee on fiscal policy to consider the over-all aspects of the expenditure and revenue program. I have not heard a healthier suggestion since I have been a Member of Congress.

Before the Civil War the Ways and Means Committee acted both as a tax-raising and money-spending committee. Such a plan would be constructive at this hour. The Secretary stated:

By providing for a preliminary legislative consideration of the over-all picture of appropriation and revenue measures it would give Congress a broad perspective of the state of the Government's finances and permit a better ordered coordination between the executive and the legislative branches in this field. This joint committee would in effect be a lens through which all appropriation and revenue measures could be viewed in relationship both to what the Nation needs and to what the Nation can afford.

When the head of our fiscal department thinks along these lines he is on solid ground. Surely some day-let us hope in the near future-some authority should begin considering the comparison of the Nation's needs with what the Nation can afford, with nine consecutive annual deficits running into the picture. We may wonder whether we are meeting what the Nation needs and what the Nation can afford. Are we supplying the needs or the wants of the people? Are these appropriations in great measure going to the wants of the people rather than to their needs? If they are, can the Nation afford them, particularly when we consider that with no great increase in our population since then our Federal Budget in 1916 was $1,034,784,655, and this year's appropriation will probably run into the staggering figure of between nine and eleven billions of dollars. If the population is substantially the same and the Nation needed only $1,034,784,655 in 1916, and in 1939 the sum runs to $10,000,000,000, how can we account for this except upon the theory that we are supplying wants instead of needs?

Issues of Federal securities are now being oversubscribed 10 to 15 times. In the Hoover administration some Government bonds were selling in the eighties. With continuing enormous Federal deficits, how long can we expect the present psychology to continue? How long will our credit last? If we had a psychologic doldrum in the Hoover administration, is it not possible to recur to it in other administrations, especially when we have 10,000,000 people unemployed and when capital is not investing itself in labor-employing activities?

As a Representative of the State of Oklahoma I should be remiss in my duty to the people of that great State if I did not advise in the Congressional Record, and thus officially, some of the fiscal aspects which would be involved in the passing of the so-called Townsend plan.

It should be remembered that Dr. Townsend himself testified that his goal was $200 per month for each pensioner—nothing less; and that his plan was for a revision every 5 years-upward.

The records of the Bureau of Internal Revenue show that that Department collected from the citizens of Oklahoma in internal-revenue taxes $62,661,773.46. This is in addition to State and local taxes, estimated at $91,358,891 paid by the citizens of the State.

It is estimated that there are substantially 8,000,000 people over 60 years of age in the United States. On the basis of $200 per month. That would mean an annual cost of $19,-200,000,000, or per capita cost of $147.69. If there are as many as 10,000,000 pensioners, the annual cost would be $24,000,000,000, or a per capita cost of $184.62—so much per head for every citizen in the United States.

How would this affect Oklahoma? It would require, in addition to the taxes I have mentioned—Federal, local, and State, amounting to $154,020,664.46—that $373,360,320 would be Oklahoma's share of the cost of the Nation's Townsend old-age pension expenses if there are 8,000,000 pensioners; and if there should be 10,000,000 pensioners, the cost would be $466,719,360 for Oklahoma's share. These estimates are made upon the figures produced at the hearing before the Ways and Means Committee, and are considered to be reliable estimates.

Can Oklahoma-or, for that matter, can any other State-afford this staggering load?

It has been argued that this bill will not raise $200 per month and that we need not be terrified at the figures I have suggested. I answer that the goal—the announced goal by the father of the movement—is $200 per month or more, according to his own testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, on a strictly Federal pension, eliminating a State-Federal matching process as under the present law. Passage of this bill, regardless of what it raises, would be the entering wedge for a Federal pension law with a goal of $200 a month or more, at which juncture the figures I have presented would apply.

An interesting observation came to me in a letter from a member of the Townsend organization in my district, in which he states:

I do not know what H. R. 6378 is (here may I interpolate that H. R. 6378 is Dr. Townsend's substitute for H. R. 2—not quoting my correspondent in this parenthesis), but I have always held that if the House would adopt the $200-a-month plan, it should be kicked into the dust heap of oblivion as the biggest bunch of fools this country ever saw. I do not know what H. R. 2 or H. R. 6378 is, but I earnestly believe that if the House fails to enact a sensible plan to provide for the old people from now on its Members would have forfeited all claims to self-respect even, to say nothing of reelection.

Great organizations interested in the welfare of our country have declared to be against the Townsend plan, being fearful of its visionary and inflationary provision, and fearful that the cost of living would skyrocket and produce a complete disbalance in our economic and fiscal condition. Among them I might mention the American Federation of Labor and the American Farm Bureau, as well as many others.

Surely these organizations have thoroughly considered this plan, else they would not have committed themselves against it.

The record shows that no economist in the Nation has approved the plan; and, on the other hand, a group of the most widely known and respected economists in the United States have declared it unsound and impracticable. The father of the movement scoffed at the idea of presenting any economist to back his proposal. One economist whom he produced at a former hearing declared that the plan would be inflationary and that the cost of living would go skyward. This economist has been discarded by Dr. Townsend.

These remarks must not be taken to indicate that I am opposed to old-age pensions, such as we can afford. It may be suggested that we should spend less money for other purposes and more for old-age pensions. That argument may be correct. But we must not wreck the credit of our country.

As I read it, the provisions of this bill would react most fearfully against people of moderate incomes and in the low-income brackets, because the cost of living would be so inflated that incomes would be cut down by the additional cost of living. The small merchant would be ruined, according to Dr. Townsend himself in his testimony, and the salaried man would be compelled to spend so much more for his living that his salary would rapidly depreciate, as would other types of income.

If this would aid the laboring man, would not the American Federation of Labor be for it? The effect upon the farmers would be paralytic. Imagine a 2 percent transaction tax upon every plow, every harrow, every movement of every bushel of corn, wheat, oats, and upon every pound of cotton in every stage of processing. Visualize the tremendous increase of living costs to the farmer under such a system, when a 2 percent transaction tax is added to the cost of all articles produced and manufactured, when in some instances it would not be unreasonable to suppose that as many as 10 to 30 transactions would be involved, each with a 2 percent tax.

We had much better improve the Social Security Act than to launch forth on this inflationary measure. We must remember that this is a superimposed tax, added to all the taxes which now exist, of whatever kind or nature. It is added to the ad valorem taxes, added to the sales taxes, added to the gasoline taxes. In fact, nothing escapes, and the passage of this bill would usher in the most serious inflation that America has ever seen, with its attendant destructive effects upon everyone who has to buy any kind of produced or manufactured article.

Will this produce recovery? Will it produce more business? Did higher taxes ever in the history of the world encourage business? No. I refuse to commit this offense against the American citizen. I still have the welfare of the American taxpayer, the American housewife, the American purchaser of goods at heart. I have never cast a vote against them. I do not propose to do so now.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DeRouen].

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Chairman, it is my desire at this time to fully analyze and explain the various sections of H. R. 6466 that caused me to vote against its passage.

I will first direct myself to words defining the definitions. In this bill the word "transaction" is broadened to take in everything. As an example, let us take the common practice of our farmers of trading one of their commodities for the commodities of another. Now, if one farmer goes to another farmer and wants to trade six barrels of corn for six barrels of rice, he must first place a valuation on these products and pay a transaction tax. He must not only keep a record of this transaction, but his valuation is subject to review by an investigator, and this investigator could be one who has little or no idea of such transactions and from a wholly different part of the country. If a farm wife went to the store to trade produce for store commodities, she also must keep a set of books and evaluate every transaction and pay a tax upon each and every one. This is not just; do you gentlemen believe that we can rejuvenate our farmers and farm wives and make bookkeepers out of them; I do not.

Now, let us go to the definition of "gainful pursuit." Under this bill the purchasing power of every 9 out of 10 persons will be cut at least 25 percent, and, in other words, it will increase the cost of living of every person at least 25 percent to pay a 2-percent tax. Is it right to tell them that the tax will only be 2 percent and then, in the long run, have it amount to at least 25 percent? The tax proposed under this bill falls the heaviest upon the people least able to pay, persons of moderate means and small incomes. Statistics show that there are 18,000,000 families in this country with incomes less than $1,500 per year. Is it fair to tax these 18,000,000 families, not 2 percent but eventually 25 percent, to pay an income of at least $4,800 to 5,000,000 families?

Mr. Chairman, I have always advocated and voted for old-age pensions, but I cannot vote for an old-age pension that is not sound, not just, and not fair to all of our people. This country was founded upon the creed of justice to everyone.

The tax in this bill will have a bad effect upon the standards of living of small-income groups, which form 82 percent of our population. It will sharply lower the already low standard of living that exists as a result of the trying conditions that confront us and which the depression has brought about.

I have always advocated and fought for assistance to mothers in need, for children in need, for the needy blind, and for the physically handicapped. These deserving groups are also part of our humanitarian program. What about them? Under this tax they will be penalized. The purchasing power of the small amount they receive will be sharply reduced, and the amounts they receive are so small that they cannot stand this diminution in its purchasing

Dr. Townsend admitted in testifying before the Committee on Ways and Means that the passage of H. R. 6466 will eliminate the middleman. He also said that the middleman was "incompetent" and was "an unnecessary appendage to our economic system." Do you know who he refers to when he says "middleman"? Well, I know. He means every little man in this country who has to buy things to sell, every little groceryman, every dry-goods seller; in fact every man who has to purchase the finished article to sell to the consumer.

Do you agree with Dr. Townsend that just because these "littlemen" not "middlemen" cannot qualify on account of lack of wealth that they should be destroyed? Well, I do not. Every man has a right to an honest living. What do you think these businessmen and their employees will say when they realize the significance of the vote of a Member of Congress of this body who represents their district? It must be remembered that we have 1,600,000 retail stores in this country employing over 4,000,000 employees and assuming the average family of 3, that means 12,000,000 people that would be eliminated from gainful employment. And that is only part of our small, moderate, and independent businesses of our country. It is estimated that such businesses employ from 10,000,000 to 12,000,000 people, and again assuming the average family of 3, that would mean from 30,000,000 to 36,000,000 people that would be put out of employment. The passage of this bill would give to goods sent in here by foreign countries an advantage over American products. Certainly any fabricated article imported into the United States would not pay the transaction taxes abroad. The same articles manufactured in America would pay the transactions taxes and that would mean that foreign products would have a tremendous advantage over American products. We are having enough trouble now trying to place our rice and cotton farmers in a profitable class and if they must pay these taxes against tax-free imported goods they cannot survive.

Do the veterans of this country who are receiving a pension for their service to their country, and those veterans who are receiving compensation for service-connected disabilities realize that their purchasing power will be cut 25 percent, or rather, in effect, that this would reduce their pensions or compensation 25 percent?

Now let us go the tax feature and its exemptions.

The big businesses are taxed at a rate of one-half of 1 percent; that is, the manufacturers, wholesalers, and jobbers, whereas the small businesses are taxed 2 percent. Is it fair to tax the small man, he who is least able to stand this tax, more than the big businessman, he who is more able to stand this tax?

Now as to exemptions. Why is it all right to tax State banks and exempt national banks? On one corner you have a State bank, on the other corner you have a national bank. They are both doing the same business in the same legal manner. Is it equitable to tax one and not the other?

Mr. Chairman, I will continue to advocate and work for an equitable old-age pension, but I want to work for one that will give to the needy old age of this country their just desserts without demolishing the entire economic structure of the rest of our country. We as legislators owe as much to one class of people as we do to the other and we cannot destroy one class for the benefit of another.

It is my fervent hope that before long we will and we can bring before this House an equitable bill, and I assure you if this is done my vote will be "yea" and not "nay," as it must be in this instance. [Applause.]
Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE].

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I have talked with hundreds and hundreds of Townsend people through my district, although I never was put on the spot and asked to declare myself whether I was for or against it, and I say to you that I have yet to meet the first Townsend person who asked or who expected or who wanted $200 per month, so you can wipe out that argument about $200 a month, because so far as I am concerned it falls on deaf ears this afternoon. It seems to me there are a lot of people here who, when asked the question, Do you favor old-age pensions? say "yes," but when asked the question as to where they are going to get the money to pay the pensions suddenly shut up like a

Here is the first bill that has within it the means for raising the revenue to make the payments provided. We spend billions of dollars here on credit day after day, and yet we will not be able, it seems to me, to answer the question, Are you in favor of old-age pensions and where are you going to get the money to pay them? So far as I am concerned, this bill is not perfect. I would rather vote for some other type of bill. The Legislature of Wisconsin has memorialized the membership of this House to pass this Townsend bill. I have received thousands of letters asking me to vote for the Townsend bill and not one single letter opposing it. I shall vote for this bill for the simple reason that it is a step in the right direction, because I favor old-age pensions financed upon a pay-as-you-go plan, and I am opposed to a continuation of the asinine fraud being perpetuated upon the citizens of this Nation under the guise of social security.

If there is to be an old-age pension, why is not an old-age pension bill here? Why has not the Ways and Means Committee, which has so vigorously condemned this measure, written an old-age pension bill and brought it to this House? They all profess their interest in old-age pensions. They all say, "We are solicitous for the welfare of the aged. We want to see them taken care of." Why is there not a bill here to take care of them? There are many people who are kissing and loving the aged when their votes are required, but they are not presenting a bill to take care of them when it is necessary. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. Elliott].

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, members of the Committee, the principle of bill H. R. 6466 is right. Reemployment of men now out of work, increased buying power, and our aged people will receive direct and immediate benefits. It is the purpose of this bill to make unnecessary those expenditures characterized as unemployment relief. The people of this country have voiced their approval of this legislation, believing sincerely that its enactment will correct the uncertainty of recovery and reform to the end that a greater and permanent prosperity will be built. The aged people that this legislation will primarily benefit are not benefited by the pay-roll tax, Social Security Act. Much the greater majority of them are not wage earners. This Congress should approve an old-age security whereby each State would pay to its aged residents the same amount of money monthly, Those residents prefer to remain in their native State among friends and relatives and not be forced by conditions to migrate to another State where the old-age pension payments are of greater amount. The old-age pension payment in each State should be the same—this bill will do that. The principle is right and I shall support its enactment. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK] such time as he desires. Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, in the course of debate today Members have explained, or attempted to justify their stand on this measure according to their pledges to Townsendites, or on the grounds of opposition of Townsend forces to their election, or on similar grounds. I do not care to do very much of explaining in that fashion. I do recall that most of the Townsend vote of Arizona was cast against me in the primary and in the general election of 1936, and that by far the larger part of the Townsend vote was cast against me in the primaries of last year. A considerable portion of their vote was cast against me in the general election last year. Had my Republican opponent last October resorted to the usual political trick of promising all things to all men and come out 110 percent for the Townsend plan, I would have had few Townsend votes in the general election of 1938, and yet I have always been friendly to a liberal provision for our aged citizens.

I have never been willing to try to fool elderly citizens by holding out hope that they are going to get $200 per month, nor have I ever been willing to promise them that, if elected to Congress, I would vote for any such measure. I remember about the 1st of June 1936 when I announced for Congress, never having been a candidate before for public office, three elderly men, neighbors and acquaintances of mine in this small town came to me and said, "All you need to do is come out for the Townsend plan and your election is assured." I said to them, "You men have known me for 22 years, and you know that I have your best interests at heart, but you know that for me to get the Townsend support I must make promises which my conscience will not permit me to make. I do not want the job badly enough to pay that sort of a price. But I do want you to know that there is not a man in the State of Arizona who would go further or who wants to do more than I do for our elderly citizens. If I am elected to Congress, with or without the Townsend vote, I shall do everything within my power to get adequate, fair, and just legislation for all who have reached the proper age of retire-Those three men went straightway and declared that I was against the Townsend plan.

When the rising vote was taken earlier today in this Chamber on the rule which would bring this bill out for consideration I voted for the rule and thus voted for the consideration of this Townsend measure. In so doing I have kept a promise made to certain Townsend members in Arizona that I would do what I could to bring their bill before the House for consideration and a vote. I am in a sort of dilemma with regard to this bill, for we now have it before us for a vote without a possibility of an amendment. I am not satisfied with this bill, and I think it ought to be amended. I am told that this is the fifth Townsend bill which has been introduced into this lawmaking body. During the last Congress hundreds of my Townsend constituents urged me to support H. R. 4199, and during this session I have been repeatedly urged to support H. R. 2. These two bills were practically identical. Now, I find that at the last minute a new Townsend bill, H. R. 6466, recommended by Dr. Townsend and by his fellow workers in Congress and out, has been substituted for H. R. 2. This present bill is quite different from the former Townsend bill, H. R. 2. I have no means of knowing whether my Townsend friends, who were so anxious that I support H. R. 2, will be equally anxious to have me support H. R. 6466. In spite of this dilemma I propose to cast my vote in favor of this new bill, H. R. 6466, although it is not what I should like to see finally enacted.

Why, then, am I voting for it? Because I believe it embodies some of the principles which I would like to see enacted into law. I believe that we ought to have a payas-you-go plan to finance old-age benefits. I believe that purchasing power in this country must be distributed for the best interests of business generally. I believe that a reasonable degree of monetary inflation is not only permissible but needed. I believe that old-age benefits, adequate in amount, are demanded as a matter of justice and not as a matter of charity.

While I am proud of the baby steps taken by this administration in social security, I do feel that our present social-security laws, especially with reference to the aged, are woefully inadequate, and that such a bill as H. R. 6466, if passed by this body, could be so amended before final enactment as to make its provisions more satisfactory than what we now have. You may not consider it wise for a Member of the House of Representatives to vote for a measure which is not entirely satisfactory to him, with the expectation that it will be improved in another body or in conference before being submitted to the President. However, I have voted for other measures with that very situation confronting me. One of the advantages of a two-house lawmaking body is the possibility and probability of improving a bill in another chamber after it has been passed by one chamber. Therefore, I think I shall take a chance on this bill, as I have done before.

The well-known story of Frankenstein has frequently been used as an illustration to picture conditions in our machine age. Some thinkers regard man today as a victim of the machine and speak of "the machine as master of the man." In this period of remarkable invention, labor-saving machines have been created intended as servants of humanity. The traditional burdens of labor have been shifted largely from humans and placed upon the sinews of steel embodied in the machines. All of this has enormously increased man's power to produce wealth, but the introduction of the machine age and the factory system is not an unmixed blessing. Along with it has come deepening poverty. It takes no stretch of the imagination, then, to regard man as in the power of his own inventions.

Certainly man is in the power of the machine under our capital st system of society, unless we can, by some legislation as this, extend the benefits of machine production to minister to the wants of man. The proper solution of this problem is a life and death question to millions of our fellow citizens, and I believe that this measure before us, with all its faults, has in it the beginnings of sane, just, and remedial legislation.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Johns].

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal this afternoon about Mr. Townsend. If I understand correctly, Mr. Townsend is not a Member of this House. The responsibility for what takes place this afternoon rests with the Members of this House. I want to say to you that in the campaign last fall Mr. Townsend never said anything to me. I have never met Mr. Townsend, but I did say to the people in my district that I expected the next House to be Democratic. I expected there would be a number of bills that would be introduced for the aid of the old people. I said that I would study the Townsend plan; that I was sure the Democratic Congress who had a majority, and also a majority in the Ways and Means Committee, would give consideration to the Townsend bill; and if there was any merit in it, they would bring it out. Here it is this afternoon under a "gag" rule where it cannot be amended at all. I am surprised that anybody criticizes it when it cannot be amended.

There are old people waiting today for the money we are going to vote to them either under this plan or some other plan. There are many of them in churches this afternoon, some of them are at home on their knees praying that they will get this money. There are young girls and boys who are traveling the highways and byways today looking for jobs. They might be able to take the places of some of these old people. I am satisfied that if they will stay on their knees and pray long enough—and I am a great believer in prayer—this Congress will do something for them, or some future Congress. That is the way I feel about it. [Applause.]

There has been a great deal said about the provisions of this bill to the effect that it would ruin the country. I can see nothing unusual about a sales tax to be alarmed about. We have sales taxes in effect in many of the States and they have been used in many instances to balance the budget. I also feel that it is something that should come only as a last resort and in my humble opinion it is going to be the only way we are going to be able to balance the Budget in the country. Our debt is so great that it is going to be absolutely necessary for every human being to make a sacrifice in order to see that it is paid. I am in hopes that a sales tax may be avoided because I have never favored it, but there is one thing about the tax proposed in this bill and that is that it will pay the obligation as we go along and we will not have to borrow money to do it. It does not increase the national debt, but it will put into circulation, if adopted, a good many million dollars.

Another thing that interests me a great deal is that it is to be spent for American goods instead of foreign products. It has been said by some Democrats and Republicans that it will ruin the country if adopted. I am frank to say that after reviewing what this country has gone through during the last 6 years, I am satisfied that if we are able to survive this bill under "gag" rule long enough to get out from under such a rule, then if some of the provisions of this bill are not workable we can then make them so at a later date.

I do not feel that Dr. Townsend should be criticized so severely because he has an idea that somebody else did not happen to think about. Nobody is under any obligation to accept it if they do not want to, and there is no use in abusing him because he happens to have some ideas of his own regarding old-age pensions.

If this bill is defeated, then we will be asked in a few days to increase the social-security allotments so as to pay some money to old people. The only question in my mind is whether they are going to get it or not. Everyone in the House here knows what has happened to the funds already paid into Social Security and realize that the people will have to be taxed again in order to pay a large amount that is to be paid out. We are now proposing to relieve the tax burden on business but at the same time continuing to increase our spending and borrowing. Anyone knows that if this is continued we are only postponing a certain day of reckoning. I think it is about time that Congress, if it is going to pay anybody anything from now on, make provision in the way of taxes to see that it is going to be taken care of and not postpone the agony until a later date.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Van Zandt].

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, mankind craves social security beyond all else in this life. Social security is the heart's desire of the human family. Social security is the goal of civilization. Social security is the primary purpose of government.

Since thought first flickered dimly in the mind of man, he has sought to protect and to preserve himself. Down through the ages, the principle of self-preservation gradually grew into something finer as many personal interests were subordinated and submerged in the rights of society. After 20 centuries of Christianity, the ideal of modern government has become social security.

Social security was the real objective that found expression in the first immortal American document—the Declaration of Independence. Thomas Jefferson envisioned social security for all Americans when he set down among certain inalienable rights, "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

That same shining light guided the founding fathers when they wrote the Constitution of the United States of America. The spirit of social security is embodied in the very preamble of the Constitution. The phrase "social security" had not been coined, of course, but the intent was plain. The primary purpose of this Government, created by the Constitution, is "to promote the general welfare and to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

For more than a century and a half we have been striving toward social security in America. Our progress may have been halting at times. Other pressing problems, both foreign and domestic, may have diverted us temporarily. But the inborn desire of mankind always set us back on the road to social security for all of our citizens.

Wider opportunities under our system of government have enabled a fair share of citizens to achieve social security by their own efforts. Rugged individualism always will be admired, but in our complex society experience has demonstrated that we cannot rely upon individual effort alone to produce social security for all and thus promote the general welfare.

This fact has been recognized for some years and social security, in the current sense of the term, has become a fundamental and outstanding problem of the Government. As a consequence, various policies have been adopted to bring our citizens closer to the goal. However, we all realize the steps taken to that end only make a meager beginning toward actual social security.

A few years ago Dr. Francis E. Townsend, of California, came forward with a proposal which is by far the best answer to our hopes and aspirations for social security thus far presented. The Townsend national recovery plan, as recently revised, squares with the spirit and the letter of the Constitution. It provides for the benefit of all our citizens, young and old alike, and thus would strengthen the Government itself.

The Townsend national recovery plan provides a sound method of raising revenue with which to pay more adequate annuities to the senior citizens of the United States. Taxes bear directly or indirectly upon all the people, and since all the people would benefit under the Townsend national recovery plan, it justly provides that all the people should bear the transaction tax to finance the plan. Moreover, the transaction tax is as painless as any tax ever devised.

The latest estimates, which are said to be extremely conservative, place the Nation's business at $360,000,000,000 annually. Under the Townsend national recovery plan, it is proposed to tax one-third of that amount, or $120,000,000,000, at the rate of one-half of 1 percent. Two-thirds of the Nation's annual business, or $240,000,000,000, would be taxed at the rate of 2 percent. The total annual revenue from these taxes would amount to $5,400,000,000. It is estimated that this would enable the Government to pay a little more than $56 monthly to the 8,000,000 citizens over 60 years of age.

While that figure would fall far short of the widely discussed figure of $200 a month, it is far more adequate than the pitiful pittance paid now under the Social Security Act. And the beneficial effects would be just as far reaching.

America owes a debt of gratitude to Dr. Townsend for his services in stimulating national interest in old-age pensions. To Dr. Townsend rightly belongs full credit for the Social Security Act. If it were not for Dr. Townsend, the President never would have conceded the pitiful inadequacy of the Social Security Act. If it were not for Dr. Townsend and his devoted followers, young and old, throughout the country, there would be no thought now in administration circles, much less any prospect of action, to liberalize the Social Security Act.

But the proposed amendments to that act are not liberal, much less adequate. I stand for the principle sought to be served by the Townsend national recovery plan. If we cannot reach the desired end in this manner, we must and will reach it by some other method. The defeat of this measure will not end this issue. On the contrary, it only will serve to intensify it. We will continue to fight until we have achieved honest-to-God social security for every citizen of the United States.

I will cite you a shining example of inadequate social security. It was taken from a preliminary report of the House Ways and Means Committee on the proposed administration amendments to the Social Security Act. That report carried a table showing how changes would benefit a wage earner whose average monthly wage is $100. It follows:

	Present	Revised
THE SELECTION OF STREET	monthly	Single	Married
Years of contributions: 50	$17. 50 22. 50 32. 50 42. 50 51. 25	$26, 25 27, 50 30, 00 32, 50 35, 00	$39.38 41.25 45.00 48.75 52.50

It would require 40 years for a married man making social-security contributions, under that sort of a set-up, to even approach the benefits that would result immediately under the Townsend national recovery plan. Forty years—40 long years of toil from now until 1979 for a married man to be entitled to benefits of $52.50 a month, under the administration's amendments.

What of the present generation of elders? What are the unfortunate elder citizens among them to do? They cannot wait until 1979 for benefits of $52.50 a month. If any of the present generation of elders survive until that date, they will set records for longevity.

Why not adopt the Townsend plan which would begin immediately to care for the elder citizens and at the same time give the younger generation an opportunity? Now is the time to act.

I want to say a word about these elder citizens who would benefit directly from the operation of the Townsend plan, while the younger generations benefited indirectly. They are the salt of the earth. They are chiefly God-fearing people, who have been the backbone of the Nation in time of peace and in war.

I have attended numerous meetings of the Townsend clubs in my district and I was impressed by the high type of citizens who attended them. They are good neighbors, the kind of people who carried the golden rule in their hearts and who carry out its precepts in everyday life.

These people are not the type to "raid" the Treasury, as some of the opponents of the Townsend bill have insultingly suggested. These same people put over the Liberty Loan drives in 1917–18. They gave their sons in the World War. Now, in the twilight of life, many of these good people are about to lose their homes because they are unable to meet the taxes on them.

Few of these elder citizens have squandered their reserves. Many had their savings swept away by the depression. They face a desperate situation today. Even those who have children can look for little aid from children, who must struggle to provide for themselves and their own children.

A large part of the population in my district are railroad men and coal miners. Some railroaders and some coal miners have been able to work 40 years at their occupations, but the percentage of men who can last 40 years at such hazardous occupations is small, indeed. What are they going to do?

Some ignorant and uninformed persons are inclined to say the Townsend plan would only benefit the elder citizens, and therefore the younger people are not supporting it. Nothing could be further from the truth. Go to a meeting of any Townsend Club in the United States and you will find as many young people and middle-aged people as old people there. Why? Because the younger generations have learned that they would benefit just as much as the senior citizens.

Think of the young men graduating from colleges and finishing high school and no opportunities open to them! Something like 3,500,000 young men find themselves in that position every year. In 1936, according to one reliable authority, 5,500,000 youths between the ages of 16 and 25 were out of school and unemployed and nearly 3,000,000 of them in dire distress or on relief rolls. Is it any wonder that members of the graduating class of a great eastern university a couple of years ago adopted the ironic slogan:

W. P. A., here we come!

Those are the sort of young people and elder people some gentlemen are inclined to ridicule and insult on the floor of this House. Let me tell some of the hearties in this House who have been beating their breasts and boasting of their courage in opposing the Townsend bill that they are not going to be back with us after the elections of 1940. We will meet but we will miss them. And there will be many a dry eye back in their districts when the people send a Member of Congress down here who will truly represent them.

On January 3, I took the oath and became a Member of Congress. I assumed an obligation to truly represent the people of my district. Among the people in my district are between eighteen and twenty thousand members of the Townsend organization, young people as well as old. I feel that I would be remiss in my duty to them if I failed to raise my voice in protest against the ridicule that has been cast upon these good people this afternoon by some of my fellow Members of Congress.

Some of the opponents of this measure seem to be very sure this bill is going to be defeated when we vote tomorrow. Perhaps it will be sent back to the Ways and Means Committee from whence it came without recommendation. But I venture to predict that it will come out of that committee and it will come back to the House backed by a favorable report.

I have had some experience in such matters. Some years ago, I sat in the gallery of this House and listened to the debate on the so-called Economy Act. Some gentlemen were very loud at that time in demanding that most of the economies should be made at the expense of the veterans of the World War and the Spanish-American War. They were very, very sure of their ground, at that time.

Since that day I have seen some of the very same gentlemen just as loud in their demands that the unjust cuts imposed upon the disabled veterans be restored. And some of the gentlemen who were loudest in their demands that the cuts be made in the name of economy, would gladly have voted for the restoration of those benefits if they had been permitted to remain in Congress. Unfortunately, however, the breast-beating advocates of economy at the expense of the veterans had been left at home.

Some years later, I sat in the gallery and listened to gentlemen who beat their breasts and yelled against the so-called soldiers' bonus. They called it a "raid on the Public Treasury." They declared it would wreck the Treasury. Well, the so-called bonus bill became a law and it did not wreck the Treasury of the United States. However, it did wreck the promising public careers of a number of gentlemen who voted against it.

I went all through that long fight for the so-called soldiers' bonus bill. We were confronted with heart-breaking defeats at several junctures. But we never stopped fighting. After each set-back we re-formed our lines and renewed the fight with added vigor and, in the end, we won.

We are going to do exactly the same thing on this Townsend bill. We never will quit until we have won this fight for adequate social security for all citizens of the United States.

Despite all the ridicule that has been heaped upon a certain section of this measure, I have no doubt about the soundness of the bill as a whole. If there are any real defects, they could be corrected later by proper amendments. Therefore, casting doubt on a single section of this bill does not disturb me. If there are any doubts I will resolve them on behalf of the people of my district.

Hence, I rise at this time to inform my colleagues that I am going to support H. R. 6466 and, in doing so, I am confident that I reflect the views of the vast majority of the people in my district. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. Izac] 2 minutes.

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Chairman, I represent the cradle of Townsendism. Nearly 150 clubs were organized and are still in existence in my congressional district. None of the organization leaders has ever been for me politically, so when I speak here in favor of this bill today I am not thinking of the leaders; I am thinking of those old people, a great number of whom—I call your attention to this fact—have come from your districts. They were not all San Diegans or Californians, but they have come there to make their home and they feel they can live on the pension that this bill provides if Congress would give it to them. Under the Social Security Act, unfortunately, we have 3,070 different kinds of pensions. Under the pending bill uniformity is the thing aimed for, and all people in the United States above the age of 60 will receive the same amount. If it is not very much, I still feel they will be satisfied. We have figured that this proposal will give them $50, $60, or $70 a month.

In 1960, and probably before, there will be 3,500,000 veterans of the World War to whom you will have to pay pensions at the rate of $60 a month. Think this over. Raise your sights a little, my friends. You are still going to have to pay $4,000,000,000 or $5,000,000,000 a year in old-age pensions even if you do not pass this bill. I believe that all of those people who have contributed to the welfare and upbuilding of this country are entitled to similar pensions. Under this bill we pay as we go. The bill may not be perfect, but it is the best we can hope for at this time; and therefore I shall support it, and I sincerely request that you who believe in more adequate and better pensions for the aged people of the United States support it likewise. [Applause.]

THE GENERAL WELFARE ACT IS DESIRED BY THE PEOPLE OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Chairman, having been granted permission to extend and revise my remarks I include therein the testimony I gave before the Ways and Means Committee in its hearings on old-age pensions and social security.

(The committee reconvened at 2:30 o'clock, pursuant to recess.) Mr. Cullen. The committee will be in order. The first witness this afternoon is the Honorable En. V. Izac, a Representative in Congress from the State of California.

STATEMENT OF HON. ED. V. IZAC, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. Cullen. Will you state your name to the reporter, Mr. Representative?

Mr. Izac. Ed. V. Izac, Twentieth District, California.

Mr. Cullen. How much time do you want?
Mr. Izac. Just a few minutes.
Mr. Cullen. Would you like to proceed with your statement without interruption?

Mr. Izac. I don't care. I would just as soon be interrupted if the committee so desires. I have no written statement, but I would like to proceed briefly, if I may.

Mr. Cullen. Proceed. Mr. Izac. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, statistics Mr. IZAC. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, statistics tell us we are in a period with a decreasing birth rate in this country. It appears from the figures of the economists that we will arrive, about the year 1950, at a birth rate that no more than makes up for the death rate, and that the population from that period on will be practically stable. Also we find, owing, I suppose to medical progress, the science of medicine, that the life proper of the average American has increased over what it made span of the average American has increased over what it used to be. In fact, in this present generation we see the age increased perhaps 10 years over what it was before.

All of this proves one thing to me, and that is that the popula-All of this proves one thing to me, and that is that the population of this country in the future will be composed of a greater number of old people than we have ever known before; that also means that we must take steps at the present time to care for a greater number of old people, since in the present scheme of industrial methods there is no place for the old man in mass-production industries. That being the case, how are we going to take care of a greater number? How are we going to take care of a greater proportion of old people in our population?

I believe there is only one answer, and that is by some kind of a

I believe there is only one answer, and that is by some kind of a pension paid to everyone above a certain age, regardless of his situation in life, regardless of whether or not he has contributed to the retirement fund, and due solely to the fact that we believe everyone has had his share in the upbuilding of this country, and that therefore it is necessary for us to give an annuity to everyone, rather than singling out individuals of any particular industry or walk of life as having contributed perhaps a greater or less amount toward his eventual retirement.

I want to pay my respects to those of you who were here and passed the Social Security Act. I think it is a fine step in the right direction, and I hope we never go back. But I do think there are certain things that should be corrected in that act.

For instance, we have 3,000 different systems under that act today, just as many systems as there are counties in the United States. I have two counties in my congressional district. Those two counties do not treat their old people in the same way, and the cost of administration is tremendous. I would like to see a system inaugurated in which all of the money that is appropriated for the old folks goes to the old folks rather than having a large amount pay for administration, for investigation, for social workers, and the like.

I was very much in favor of the General Welfare Act when we asked for a hearing last year. I haven't changed my mind on that. I still think it is the best bill we can bring out, and I certainly hope this committee will at least give us an opportunity to vote on it on the floor of Congress.

The present act, as you know, covers too few people. It is not, as I have pointed out, the same in any two counties, and the Public Assistance pamphlet that I have here from the Social Security Board shows that the average payments last year ranged from $4.74 in Mississippi to $32.30 in California. I suppose you have heard those figures before, and I am not going to give you a mass of figures in my testimony today.

But I think it is worthy of comment at this time that the old

But I think it is worthy of comment at this time that the old folks of Mississippi are just as much entitled to relief while alive, in their later years, as the people of my State. But even the people of my State are not able to live with any degree of comfort on an average of $32.30, and that is why I think the General Welfare Act, with its provision for a tax on all of the people on a uniform basis, a uniform tax affecting the whole country and every industry in that country, is perhaps the most equitable provision that could be enacted into law—if it is 2 percent, if it is 3 percent—I don't care what it is, but in that one way, above all other ways that have been suggested, we are using for old-age assistance the money that is received and raised for that particular purpose, none of it going to take care of other matters of governmental import. governmental import.

Now, as we proceed with the functioning of an act, such as the General Welfare Act, in which we raise the money by, let us say, deneral welfare Act, in which we take the hold of the a 2-percent tax, gross-income tax—of course, I know there is some difference of opinion about the transactions tax and the grossincome tax. For the life of me I can't see much difference. appear to me to be practically the same. You tax money where it is. If I don't get any money, I don't have to pay a tax. If there is no money changing hands, there is no tax, but when I get a hundred dollars you tax me for that hundred dollars as I receive it.

It seems to me it is a very equitable tax. always been against the functioning of the net-income tax, because there are so many ways of avoiding payment of the tax, and your committee certainly has come face to face with that proposition committee certainly has come face to face with that proposition in the last few years, and I want to compliment the committee on closing many of the loopholes that have existed for many years. And I dare say in the next few years you are going to be called upon to close some more loopholes that become evident as the upon to close some more loopholes that become evident as the days go by.

But when you propose a tax of this kind, let us say 2 percent, there is no evading it. As the money comes in, the cash register cannot lie, and the 2 percent taken from that total is the money that goes into the fund for paying annuities to our old folks. It is readily observed that if we have a fund of a certain size and distribute that money among all of the people above a certain age, let us say 60 years, that there may come a time, because of a greater number of old people heave the people above a certain age.

age, let us say ou years, that there may come a time, because of a greater number of old people being taken out of places of employment, they will surrender to the younger generation more jobs than the younger generation can fill. I question that very much, however. In fact, I believe with the advance of technology we will be able to do the work of this Nation with perhaps one-third the workmen, and in that eventuality we will have to come to a lowerworkner, and in that eventuality we will have to come to a lowering of the pension age perhaps much below 60 years.

But I believe that we should and will, if we enact this law, profit by the experience over the years, and when we find that a certain number of our people are needed in industry, all those above the age that is required for industry will be pensioned. Also I would not attempt to say what the payments should be, because that again depends on the number of people that have to be divided into the fund which is raised in order that all may share and share alike.

I also believe that there never should be a pauper's oath subscribed to by old persons in this country. If a person is in gainful employment, it seem to me that if he wants an old-age annuity paid to him he should be perfectly willing to drop out of gainful employment, and I believe that could be a provision of this act, so that as a pensioner receives his money for doing nothing, in so that as a pensioner receives his money for doing nothing, in reality he is opening up a job for a younger man.

And I also might point this out: When a man arrives at the age of 60 years, usually his family is raised. The man who needs the employment today, gentlemen, is not the 60-year-old, who should be taken care of by an annuity, but the young man who is trying to raise and educate a family. We are not doing that now; we are spreading a paltry few dollars in relief, some direct, some W. P. A., some under various methods throughout the country, among people who cannot find employment. How much better it would be to give an annuity to all of a certain age and provide work for all those below that age. those below that age.

Now, I have something I would like to draw to your attention, gentlemen, that I do not believe has been touched upon yet in these hearings. This is my first opportunity to come before the committee and I don't know what has transpired in the past; but committee and I don't know what has transpired in the past; but do you realize that at the age of 60 years, at the average age of 60 years, for the war veterans of the World War there will be 3½ millions of us left? And if the same rate of payment of pensions to those of us who are then alive is given as is given now to the Spanish War veterans, $60 a month, you will have between 2 and 3 billions of dollars just for that one class. Add to that all of your civil-service pensioners add to that the retirement plans of Swift. civil-service pensioners, add to that all of your civil-service pensioners, add to that the retirement plans of Swift & Co., Armour & Co., and all of the big corporations, Standard Oil, and so on, and you will find that you will have billions and billions of dollars paid out in annutites 20 years from now that will make the few hundred millions we are paying out now seem like a drop in the bucket. I tell you this only to have you raise your sights to what we are coming to.

If $60 is considered sufficient for most of the civil considered suffic sights to what we are coming to.

If $60 is considered sufficient for most of the civil service and the veterans and other civil and commercial firm employees, I don't see why we can't stretch it a little and cover the whole population in that way, pensioning all of those arriving at a certain age, say 60 years, or if we can reduce it to less, let us reduce it, and in that way do away with all our boards and commissions, and investigators and considerations and considerations. reduce it, and in that way do away with an our boards and com-missions and investigators and social-service workers. I would like to see the day when the Veterans' Administration or some similar authority may send out the checks directly to all of our old people. All they should have to prove is that they are Amer-ican citizens, eligible because of age, and then have all of the ican citizens, eligible because of age, and then have all of the money that we raise go to them direct.

I believe that can be done with an administrative cost practically negligible. I understand that the Veterans' Administration cost for administrative purposes today is between 2 and 3 percent. Think of what relief today costs, what it costs the counties, States, and the Government. This will do away with a tremendous burden that the municipalities and political subdivisions are under at the present time.

I believe, gentlemen, that is all I care to say.

Mr. Cullen. May I ask you a question?

Mr. Izac. Yes.

Mr. IZAC. Yes.

Mr. Cullen. I take it you are in favor of H. R. 11 as against H. R. 2?

Mr. Izac. Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that in order to get out of a division among the old-age pension adherents in the House last year I withdrew from all participation in steering activities on either side, and I will not now take sides in this. I will, however, vote for any such measure as the one I have outlined, and I do not vote for any such measure as the one I have outlined, and I do not care whether, in the wisdom of the committee, they see fit to limit this to a certain amount or not, because I believe eventually, regardless of the amount that is raised it is going to be necessary for the committee or the House of Representatives or the Congress to determine whether that is a living wage or not. And if it is not a living wage we might just as well stay where we are at the present time, but if it becomes we will say $200 a month, as the original plan called for, and the cost of living due to some reasons over which we have no control amounts to $300 a month, it is readily seen that we are no better off than we are at the present time.

Mr. Cullen. That $200 a month you say, would undoubtedly increase the cost of living?

Increase the cost of living?

Mr. Izac. Undoubtedly the 2-percent tax will increase the cost of living; and I have yet to find a workman who will not agree on this; that he is perfectly willing to be taxed if he feels everybody else will be taxed likewise especially in a matter of this kind where he is going to have the benefit of that taxation in his later years.

Mr. Cullen. And you also believe in the principles of the Social Security Act as written in our statutes today?

Mr. Izac. Absolutely; I think it is the finest thing that was ever done by our Government in its 150 years, in being concerned with the welfare of the people under this Government.

But I do think there is room for improvement. We call this General Welfare Act, for instance, a recovery measure. We must General Welfare Act, for instance, a recovery measure. We call this feeral Welfare Act, for instance, a recovery measure. We must not lose sight of that feature, that by putting more money into circulation, it is done to help business.

We saw that last year. We saw that when we appropriated $2,000,000,000 for the veterans. Its effect was felt, believe me. When those veterans spent that money the wheels of business turned. When you stopped appropriating money here a year and a half ago we almost came to a crisis, but last spring we saw the folly of that policy and we appropriated more money and the a hair ago we almost came to a crisis, but last spring we saw the folly of that policy and we appropriated more money, and the result is we are enjoying a little bit of prosperity in this last 6 months or so, and I believe we are going along better and will continue to so long as Government spending is necessary, if we will meet that deficit which is certainly prevalent today, because business is not taking up the slack.

Mr. Cullen. I was interested in Senator Pepper's statement today when he said today, among other things, that when the Government paid the bonus to our soldiers we were then passing through, after they had collected this money, prosperity, and very nearly had our Budget balanced.

Mr. Izac. Well, I will say this: I agree with the President of the United States. I think we can balance the Budget very readily if we will increase business in this country, because, and you gentlemen know it better than any other Members of the House, when you have a tax that tax is on every dollar that circulates in this country, and it is bound to come back when you increase the national income to $80,000,000,000, and I believe a measure of this national income to $80,000,000,000, and I believe a measure of this kind, where we are putting actual money into circulation every month of the year, is bound to increase business.

Mr. Cullen. Any questions by the committee? Mr. Boehne. Mr. Boehne. I think you have given us a new thought that has not been expressed before with reference to the three and one-half million veterans who will arrive at the age of 60 years soon and who, in all probability, will receive pensions from the Federal Government for their services plus the many other employees of various in all probability, will receive pensions from the rederal Government for their services, plus the many other employees of various departments and of industry. Do you believe that those who are receiving this beneficence should also receive the same amount of pensions as may be payable to others over 60 years of age who were not fortunate or unfortunate enough to have been in the war, or the recipient of a pension in another form? In other words, wouldn't you have the same distinction there as you

Mr. Izac. I believe you would. However, I feel this way; if we will have a pension plan that will adequately take care of our older people, if some of them have a little bit more than the others I am not worried about those few being able to buy more others I am not worried about those few being able to buy more of the luxuries of life. But what I am aiming at is the man and the woman who in their later years haven't anything on which to live. They have no pension from anybody. If we can give them, as we figured last year under the General Welfare Act, $60 or $70 per month, I would feel that they were at least being taken care of, that they would have the necessities of life and perhaps some of the luxuries. We will never, in a democracy, have everyone with the same income exactly, but we should see to it that there is a minimum below which we should never go.

Mr. Boehne. You are not necessarily wedded to the enforced spending policy, are you?

Mr. Boehne. You are not necessarily wedded to the enforced spending policy, are you?

Mr. Izac. No; I am not wedded to the enforced spending by anyone. However, I feel this way: If this 2 percent gross income or transactions tax is put into effect and it raises enough money to pay all of those over 60 years of age, say, $60 a month, I do not question that the people will spend that money and it will get into circulation. I do, however, question if you give them more than they normally consume whether there wouldn't be some hoarding of it unless you made it mandatory that they spend it within a certain length of time. There is that danger, but it is just like the man who has $5,000 and he goes out and hires five heads of families at $1,000 a year. Every one of those five is then able to live. He has money with which to buy food and clothing and shelter for his family. That money is all in circulation. Invariably it is all in circulation. Why? Because it is what it costs to live in this country, and we can determine that cost under an act of this kind; and if it produces too much money, we can lower the age limit so that it takes in more people below a certain age, even if we have to go to 55 years of age or some lower age.

Mr. Boehne. Yes; but using your same example, the man who puts the $5,000 to work is not going to put it to work unless he has reasonable assurance he will get it back. He makes an investment on which he wants, first, a return, and, in the second place, he wants to invest it in a form where it will not be lost to him.

Mr. Izac. That is correct. I was not considering it from an investment standpoint. I was considering it from the point of view of the advisability of the Nation putting this money to work in that way.

Mr. Boehne. We all have that streak of human nature where we

Mr. Boehne. We all have that streak of human nature where we like to hold on to what we have.

Mr. Izac. That is correct. Now, let us consider the Government of the United States. The Government of the United States is going to do that very thing, but you say, perhaps, they will not get anything out of it. I say they will. I say they will get a feeling of security for the old people that is worth billions and billions of dollars, a feeling of security that every person should have. Why, the comfort that comes from that is sufficient to cure most of the ills of this country. The ordinary hendit or robber is most of the ills of this country. The ordinary bandit or robber is striving for security. If the ordinary citizen knew that at a certain time of his life he was going to be able to retire and have an annuity sufficient for his needs it would make for better citizenship.

Mr. Boehne. You are continuing a bit further than my question. When the Government passes out this money, it must receive it from someone else. There is a little difference there.

Mr. Izac. That is correct, and that is why I am in favor of a tax such as this, which raises the money which we are going to TISE

Mr. Boehne. I ask this question not facetiously at all, but do you

Mr. Boehne. I ask this question not facetiously at all, but do you believe that the transactions tax or the gross-income tax necessarily leaves our old theory of a tax basis, that of ability to pay? Aren't we getting away from that theory by doing that?

Mr. Izac. Let me answer that in this way: If we had a net incometax law that functioned so that every person paid in accordance with his income, I would say you are correct, but under the present set-up we have so many exemptions and so many ways of evading payment of taxes that I am convinced that there is only one sure way to get the money, and that is when the cash register says you have a hundred dollars, you take the tax from that, based on that $100. on that $100.

Mr. CROWTHER. Congressman Izac, you said that you were like the President—you were not afraid of our debt. How large a debt do you think we might safely accumulate in this country in the immediate future?

immediate future?

Mr. Izac. Well, Mr. Crowther, I am not an economist, of course, but I would say that I believe we need never have any fear of the mounting debt as long as the people were patriotic, had some assurance of security in their old age, were absolutely sold on the principles of democracy, and believed in the fundamental American rights as enumerated in the Bill of Rights. I don't think money enters into it. I don't think it is a question of that. The credit of the Nation certainly is the people that make up the Nation, and as long as we have a free, liberty-loving population I shall not worry. I don't think the question of dollars and cents enters into it, because I believe there are lots of other ways of conducting our affairs than by putting enormous quantities of gold down in the ground some place, and so on. I think we have the ability in this country to run our affairs without gold if we have to.

Mr. Crowther, I don't agree.

Mr. Crowther. I don't agree.

Our Treasury is going along now, but we are going to be asked to increase our national debt $5,000,000.

Mr. Izac. In our political economy, run as run by Italy and Germany, you bet we could. You don't have to have a dollar. It was a received to the province of the could be to the could many, you bet we could. You don't have to have a dollar. I grant you you won't be able to deal with other nations so readily, but here not so long ago we were sending 400 tons of lard to Hamburg every week, out of Baltimore. It cost money in exchange, so Hitler said, "No more lard; we need other things more."

So, they don't have much lard and oil and grease in Germany, but just the same they are getting on. Why? Because there is a system of barter in that country. It is an internal economy. They can tell the rest of the world to go places, and they get along all right.

Mr. Crowther. Do you advocate that? Mr. Lzac. No; I do not. We are a long way from that. But I merely tell you this to show you you don't have to have gold, except to a limited amount for international purposes, international trade.

Mr. Crowther. I am not talking about gold. I am talking about borrowing money and paying the interest on the national debt. It is now $1,000,000,000 a year.

Mr. Izac. I don't care to try to burden the committee with my theories on that, but the monetary situation is not as I would like to see it, and I think we are in sad need of monetary reform.

That, of course, would come under a different committee.

Mr. Crowther. That is a pretty extensive subject for study.

Mr. IZAC. Yes, sir.

Mr. Crowther. You quoted the fact of the recurrence of our prosperity with the distribution of the bonus money.

Mr. Izac. Yes, sir. Mr. Crowther. Are you aware that the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Eccles, laid to the bonus, the recession which that?

Mr. Izac. I don't know that, and I can't agree with him, if he did, because I saw this money placed in circulation all over the country, especially by my buddles out in California, and I would say it had a tremendous bearing on the prosperity we enjoyed in California for a full year after the payment of these bonus bonds.

Of course, don't forget that was not the only money we were spending. You were appropriating here for relief and the like about $2,000,000,000 in addition to that. It was when you stopped all this spending, all of a sudden. In other words, we ought to retrench gradually. It was because it was done suddenly that we got into difficulties. That, I believe, was the real cause of the recession, and since we started on the P. W. A. program and money was in circulation in all the communities of the United States times got better, and while it is true we still have a great number of people unemployed, in my opinion that is not diet to the fact that we have not done all we could in the not due to the fact that we have not done all we could in the line of public works and so on; it is due to the fact that we don't need so many hands to do the work of the Nation. The machine has made it unnecessary for us to use so many people to do the work. That is to what I attribute the need, really, for a pension of this kind.

Mr. Crowther. Of course, there is a great deal of discussion, pro and con, as to the truth of that statement, as to how far technological displacement of labor has contributed to our unemployment. That is a moot question. Now, you spoke a moment ago about mandatory spending. Have you any idea how to bring that about, administratively? What is your idea about that? What methods could be employed to make certain this money

What methods could be employed to make certain this money will be spent within the 30-day period?

Mr. Izac. As I say, Mr. Crowther, I believe it will be unnecessary to pass any enactment against hoarding, or in favor of mandatory spending, unless this amounts to so much more than is needed by an individual on which to live. But I would rather see it—if there is so much money collected by this tax, I would rather see it go to lowering the age limit at which our people might profit by this annuity, even if we have to go to 55 or 50 years. But eventually, by experience, you are going to have to determine the balance there, how many people are taken off this roster to go on this roster, how much money does this bring in, which permits the payment of a living wage, something more than just the necessities, some of the luxuries for the older people.

just the necessities, some of the luxuries for the older people.

Mr. Crowther. Have you made any statements—I missed the first part of your statement—about how many new jobs this will

Mr. Izac. No; I don't put in any statistics. I let the economists

Mr. Crowther. Have you any idea?
Mr. Izac. I figure roughly 4,000,000 jobs would be opened up immediately by all of the people who would accept this pension.

Mr. Crowther. Let me say this to you: I asked a witness a question referring to that the other day. I find that in the Government service, where there is an existent pension of $1,200 a year, under civil service, which becomes automatic at the age of 68, that of those eligible to accept that, only 6 percent had accepted willingly, and at 70, when it becomes mandatory, 93 percent of eligibles ask for an Executive order for extension of cent of eligibles ask for an Executive order for extension of service.

Now, I wonder if in civil, economic life, the attitude is going to be any different on the part of the people who attain the age of 65 or 68 to immediately leave the scene of action. Here is a pension in the Government service. That is here. This other is a phantasy, to a degree, up to now. We don't know whether it will be here or not, or whether it will be $200 or not. All sorts of amounts are suggested here. You suggest $60 or $70. Dr. Townsend and other witnesses claim that would not be beneficial at all because that would not feed the purchasing stream necessary to bring about the activity that will develop the tax. I think at the first hearing in 1936 Dr. Townsend described that. I asked him what he thought about our $30 pension in the Social Security Act what he thought about our $30 pension in the Social Security Act which we were discussing at that time, and if I remember correctly he said that just meant a little more beans and bacon, that is he said that just meant a little more beans and bacon, that is all; added sales of beans and bacon. They wanted enough to buy the products of the heavy industries, pianos, graphophones, radios, automobiles, rugs, carpets, furniture, and everything of that sort.

You say it is only going to $60 or $70. That is not going to bring about the result that is painted in roseate colors for us.

Mr. IZAC. On the contrary, Mr. CROWTHER, I believe it will. Very few classes of people in this country get the pay Government employees get. It may seem small to us in Washington because the cost of living is high, but just the same take the people in my district—the people in that district unless they are in a high-class trict—the people in that district unless they are in a high-class metropolitan area, are not getting much more than $60 a month average. I know they are not out in California and that is considered one of the bright spots so far as living conditions are concerned.

I really believe you are going to find a great number of people are going to take advantage of this law if it is enacted and I further believe that if Dr. Townsend could be assured that more people would take advantage of this, down maybe to the age of 55 or 50 years, he would see that the same amount of money is placed in circulation and a greater number of people are given some chance to live—will at least gain some chance to have the necessities and luxuries of life.

Mr. Crowther. They won't get many luxuries on $60 a month.
Mr. Izac. In some sections of the country they will.
Mr. Crowther. I have heard a great deal about California but I don't believe you can buy many luxuries in California on $60 a

Mr. Izac. I know this, Mr. Crowther: I would like to have $60 a lot more than $35, and $35 is all we are getting out there today, and the average is $32. If we could get this $60, I am sure our people would be very much pleased.

However, if your committee wants to report out any bill that is However, if your committee wants to report out any bill that is any better than anything we have at the present time I will support it. I will support any bill that you bring out that is better. In fact, I can't see any reason why we should not treat our old people to the very best of our ability, and I will go with the committee to the limit. If you think that a mandatory provision of spending is best, I will go along with you on that, but in any case I ask the committee to give us more for our old folks than we have at the present time.

Mr. CROWTHER. I don't say that mandatory spending is best. wanted to get your views as to how to administer it as to what might be done to bring it about. I don't think it is practicable

Mr. Izac. I hate to see any spy system over the American people. Mr. Crowther. Sure. I don't see how you can do it. Mr. Izac. The administrative costs are one of the things I am complaining about now—the administration costs in the county, in the State, in the Nation as a whole. All this is taken from the one who is entitled to the old-age pensions. That is wrong: I admit it. It gives jobs to a few social workers and a few investigators and boards and things of that kind, but how much better to have that check come, we will say, from the Veterans' Administration in Washington here direct to the old person with no intervening medium, nobody else to use up some of the money that should go to those people who really need it, and who will put it in circulation, I am sure, because they want the good things of life. I don't think you have to make it mandatory.

Mr. McCormack. Suppose the Members here and you constituted a little world. Suppose each one of us made $25 a week, and suppose you made $1,000 a month, and you arrived at 60 years of age. Do you think we have the duty of paying you $200 a month?

Mr. Izac. I didn't say $200 a month. Mr. McCormack. Well, $100 a month. Mr. Izac. I say you should be taxed.

Mr. McCormack. When you are making a thousand dollars a month and we are making $25 a week?

month and we are making $25 a week?

Mr. Izac. The only way you will ever make this uniform is to give it to everybody, and if I am making a thousand dollars, or, let us say, I have a million dollars accumulated, and my income is that, and I am sitting back doing nothing, and it is just rolling in, still I would say I should be given that $50 or $60 or $70 or $100, whatever it may be, because if we attempt to differentiate between classes and types of people, it will not work. That is the reason you have to have a million employees in the Federal Government, in the Federal service. in the Federal service.

Mr. McCormack. Well, I guess you have answered my question. Let me ask you this: Of course, whatever plan there is, it will all start out with the proposition that we want to do the best we can, start out with the proposition that we want to do the best we can, not only for the senior citizens, so-called, but for the other citizens. My views go beyond that. I think of the infant, whose parents are unable to give him the minimum needs; I am thinking of the disabled who are unable to take care of themselves. I don't think you will find any person who will disagree that we must do the best we can, but there must be a regard to this fact, that a simple transfer of purchasing power is not going to accomplish the ends you have in mind. If you increase the purchasing power of one group and decrease the purchasing power of other groups, do you think you are going to get the velocity which you have referred to?

Mr. IZAC. I believe by a better circulation of what money there is in this country, what income there is; yes. And furthermore, let me say this about your infant. That infant has a father and mother. They are in the prime of life. If there are any jobs, let us give them to this fellow, not to somebody that is 60 or 70 or 80 years old, because he has to work in order to keep body and soul years old, because he has to work in order to keep body and soul together.

Mr. McCormack. You understand that when I referred to infant, I meant one who is dependent upon someone for the necessities of life or who has no father or mother. There are countless numbers of those throughout the country that society must give consideration to and does give consideration to.

Mr. Izac. You have dependent children under the Social Security Act at the present time.

Mr. McCormack. But don't you think we should do as much as we can beyond the old person? Don't you think we should take care of everyone who requires assistance?

Mr. Izac. I certainly do, and in that connection I introduced last session and again this session another provision to the Social Security Act, taking care of those who are helplessly crippled. We have never done anything for them, and they should be taken care of just the same as the blind, because a blind person can sit there and sell pencils, the helplessly crippled cannot even get out of bed. But I say if you will take the older people and pension them, the younger generation will then have the jobs, and they will provide for their families. Some are not able to do it today because we know there are at least ten or twelve million of them that are unemployed.

Mr. McCormack. Let me ask you here from another aspect. Suppose you have a corner store out in your district—you can visualize the man who runs a little corner store, a drug store, a grocery store, or any other kind of a store; by the time the goods get to you that you sell to the public there will be quite a few transaction taxes, will there not?

Mr. Izac. Yes; there could be.

Mr. McCormack. From a dozen to 15 transaction taxes. Mr. Izac. Well, I don't know that there would be that many.

Mr. McCormack. How many would you say at the minimum? Mr. Izac. Well, it depends on the commodity of which you are beaking. Let us take wheat, for instance. There is a good exspeaking. Let us take wheat, for instance. There is a good example, because bread is the staff of life. Wheat is sold to the miller.

Mr. McCormack. Let us take bread. There are over 20 ingredients that go into bread alone.

Mr. Izac. Well, I don't know how many, but I would say at least

Mr. McCormack. It starts with the farmer, who grows the wheat. He pays a transactions tax. Mr. Izac. Oh, no.

Mr. McCormack. Oh, yes; under the Townsend plan.

Mr. Izac. I see what the gentleman means. In other words, when he gets the money for selling his wheat, he pays a certain tax out that. That is granted.
Mr. McCormack. Well, where does it go from him? It is sold on of that.

the market, is it not?

Mr. Izac. It is sold to the miller.

Mr. McCormack. Then the miller pays a transactions tax.
Mr. Izac. That is correct.

Mr. McCormack. That is true. Where does it go from the miller? Mr. Izac. He sends the flour to the baker.
Mr. McCormack. Well, that is a pretty broad jump, to the baker. What about the transportation from the farmer to the miller, in case the farmer does not do his own transporting?

Mr. Izac. I would say that whoever gets the money is the one who pays the tax.

Mr. McCormack. There is a transactions tax there; that makes

Mr. Izac. The transactions tax on the transportation is not based on the value of the commodity. It is based on the amount of

Mr. McCormack. True. Then from the miller it certainly doesn't go to the baker. I don't know much about it, but-

Mr. Izac. I imagine it does go to the baker, in the big cities. Mr. McCormack. What about the brokers. Aren't most of these things sold in some grain exchange?

Mr. Izac. I presume so, Mr. McCormack, Well, we will eliminate that. From the miller it doesn't usually go to the wholesaler, does it?

Mr. Izac. I believe not. The miller—well, in southern California
I would say it goes from the Globe mills direct to the bakers, the bakery corporations. Yes; I know it does, as a matter of fact. It is delivered in large quantities to the baking corporations from the miller.

Mr. McCormack. Yes; but we are talking about the corner store now.

Mr. Izac. All right.

Mr. McCormack. There would be a transactions tax on the transportation, wouldn't there?

Mr. Izac. Yes.

Mr. McCormack. Then there would be a transactions tax going to the baker

Mr. Izac. That is right.
Mr. McCormack. You are talking about the large corporation that does its own baking and retailing.
Mr. Izac. I understand that nearly all large bakers now are part of a large combine.

Mr. McCommack. I can understand that. Up my way it goes to the wholesaler and from him to the jobber and there are several other transactions in it. In any event, as I see it, before it gets to the retail store there are some 8 to 15 transactions. You will agree there are more transactions in the case of a retail store, and the independent, than there would be in the case of a large corporation who is both the menufacturer and the retails. tion who is both the manufacturer and the retailer. Mr. Izac. That is right.

Mr. McCormack. What about the independent, the middleman, or the corner store? Could they stand that competition very long? Mr. Izac. Well, I would say if no other step were taken by Congress to have them all treated alike that there would be a saving to the big corporation that goes to the farmer and buys direct from him, processes the stuff, and presents it to the consumer on the table. sumer on the table.

Mr. McCormack. And the result, unless there is some compensating law to protect the independent, the middleman, and the small store, is that he would be squeezed out.

Mr. Izac. That is correct, sir.

Mr. McCormack. And that would mean at least 2,000,000 small-business men and independent-store men throughout the country would be squeezed out. Mr. Izac. I believe so.

Mr. McCormack. And that would affect from twelve to fifteen million employees throughout the country.

Mr. Izac. People would still pay just as much for bread.

Mr. McCormack. I know, but it is everything. Bread is only an illustration.

Mr. Izac. But the 12,000,000 people that would be thrown out of employment because of the corner grocer shutting down, or the corner druggist, or the corner clothing store, those people are certainly going to find employment somewhere else, unless we de-cide that one baker in each town is sufficient, like perhaps they do in Germany today, and one clothing store and one of each of these endeavors is sufficient, and have a sort of State-owned affair.

these endeavors is sufficient, and have a sort of State-owned affair.

Mr. McCormack. You say they are going to get employment elsewhere. Can you tell me where? I would like to know.

Mr. Izac. If there are a thousand people trading with a chain store, and 500 with a retailer alongside of him, I mean a private individual alongside of the big chain store, if the 500 go over to the chain store thousand, it is going to take more employees to take care of the 1,500 than it did the 1,000.

Mr. McCormack. You concede that if the chain store did that it would employ these people. Do you think it will absorb all the

Mr. McCormack. You concede that if the chain store did that it would employ these people. Do you think it will absorb all the millions displaced as a result of this law?

Mr. Izac. It could very readily. Take the city of Washington, or my city of San Diego. There are too many grocery stores, too many drug stores, too many garages, too many of everything. We can get along with less, and we could get along with one big establishment. lishment run by the State if we believed in totalitarianism. don't

Mr. McCormack. Let us see where that leads us. That leads us to an intense monopoly of all the business activities of the country, as a result of the passage of this law, doesn't it?

Mr. Izac. Unless there was some compensating law.

Mr. McCormack. I say with no compensating law, as a result of the passage of this law, your middleman is squeezed out and your whole country is in the control of the large corporations. They have the control of all business.

Mr. Izac. I will say this, the big corporations will reduce the transactions as much as possible to avoid paying the tax.

Mr. McCormack. And that is going to affect the recipients of this pension. There is going to be less revenue then, isn't there?

Mr. Izac. I believe so.

Mr. McCormack. But in any event, assuming everything you say is true about the middleman being squeezed out, and the employees being absorbed—and I know you won't be offended when I say I can't see it quite that far; there may be some of them absorbed or reemployed—assuming every one of them was, the passage of this law, unless something else is done, would bring about a highly centralized monopoly of business in the country.

Mr. Izac. A little more highly than it is at the present time, I would say.

Mr. McCormack. It certainly would be to the extent of squeezing out a couple of million small-business men and independents. You don't stand for that, I know you don't. You don't stand for a monopoly of that kind, do you?

Mr. Izac. Absolutely, if it is something for the welfare of the people, of course.

Mr. McCormack. Now, in the consideration of this bill, having admitted that condition will arise, unless something else happens, what are you prepared to suggest that some committee or Congress should do to prevent that monopoly happening?

Mr. Izac. I would say this: I can see that we could still make this consideration even if we received less money, because if we don't raise function even if we received less money, because if we don't raise money enough on the 2-percent gross-income tax, or transactions tax, you can still increase it. In Hawaii I understand they increased it for some things and decreased it for other things, and there is nothing hard and fast about it. If it is the kind of commodity such as you have in mind, the large chain-store groceries, we could say, "Well, that type of business pays a higher tax than any could say, "Well, that to

Mr. McCormack. You would suggest punitive taxation to accomplish the purpose?

Mr. Izac. Well, you can call it punitive, if you wish.

Mr. McCormack. It would be punitive.

Mr. Izac. No; it would be an equalizing tax, to equalize the burden of the little fellow, so that the big corporation would have to pay practically the same.

Mr. McCormack. You say equalize the burden. You mean protect the little fellow.

tect the little fellow.

Mr. Izac. Well, it would be equalizing the burden. He will have to pay for many more transaction taxes than the big business, through whose hands these different transactions do not pass.

Mr. McCormack. Wouldn't it also be fair to say that it is to prevent the oppressive results of this tax from destroying the little fellow?

Mr. Izac. Well, if it proved that it would be oppressive to the little fellow and that there was no way that the big fellow could be made to pay the same, then I think we would have to do something, because I certainly am in favor of the little fellow rather than have monopoly choke the life out of his endeavors.

Mr. McCormack. I realize that. I didn't ask the question on the asumption that you were not. I asked the question so that you would realize with the passage of the bill there are consequences that grow out of it, and two of them are consequences you would fight vigorously against; one, the throwing out of employment of the the officer million men with the consequent reemployment. twelve to fifteen million men, with the consequent reemployment of some, and, furthermore, the further development of monopoly in its most extreme form.

Mr. Izac. I still think, however, that you could, by proper wording of an act of this kind, make it possible for each commodity as it reaches the market or reaches the consumer to pay the same number of transaction taxes, and in that way you could make the big corporation pay the same as the little fellow of the country.

Mr. McCormack. Assuming Dr. Townsend testified they should be squeezed out, they are incompetent, the little fellow, you would not agree with that.

Mr. Izac. Why, no; I think they have their place

Mr. McCormack. I say, assuming he did testify to that, you don't agree with him. You believe the little fellow has a place.

Mr. Izac. Yes; I should like to see the little-business man encouraged rather than discouraged, because that means just that many more businesses that prevent us from going totalitarian.

Mr. McCormack, And unless some compensating legislation or legislation of other kind is passed in connection with this bill, then the inevitable result is that the small-business man and the independent businessman is bound to be squeezed out.

Mr. IZAC, No; I say it could be right in this very act.

Mr. McCormack. I say, unless there is-

Mr. IZAC. In this act.
Mr. IZAC. In this act.
Mr. McCormack. Unless something is put in this act, or some other legislation is passed, the result of the passage of this act alone, as it now stands, would be the wiping out of the small-business man and the independent?

Mr. Izac. I don't think any of us would agree to that.
Mr. McCormack. But unless something is done to protect him, that would be the inevitable result.

that would be the inevitable result.

Mr. Izac. Doesn't the gentleman believe we could have that kind of arrangement in a tax system? He is expert in taxation.

Mr. McCormack. I am just asking you for your view.

Mr. Izac. I think, though, I am not as qualified to speak as the gentleman is, that your committee could very readily place in this bill a provision whereby there would be no short cut to transactions to avoid payment of these taxes.

Mr. McCormack. But unless there is something done at this time, in view of your admission, and our little colloquy, the monopoly that will develop and the squeezing out of the small-business man and independent businessman, would you want the business man and independent businessman, would you want the bill passed without some protection in there?

Mr. Izac. No; I would want it protected.

Mr. McCormack. Assuming it is not in there, would you vote for the bill?

Mr. Izac. I would certainly make an effort to see that a provision was put in there, even if I had to offer the amendment myself.
Mr. McCormack. But supposing the amendment were defeated.
Mr. Izac. I would still vote for the bill, because I believe we can make it work.

Mr. Treadway. Congressman, I was considerably interested in your reference to the national debt. You and Dr. Crowther had a little colloquy about it. I understood you to say the matter of the size of that debt is of very little consequence.

Mr. Izac. I think so. Mr. Treadway. You were brought up out in California?

Mr. Izac. I have been there only 17 years.

Mr. Treadway. You didn't move there from New England?

Mr. Izac. No, sir; I moved from Iowa. I was born and raised

Mr. Treadway. Because we of New England never were trained to that idea. Family indebtedness—it made no difference how extravagant anybody was—was an obligation, and went right straight along.

Mr. Izac. Oh, but the indebtedness incurred in this country

Mr. 12AC. On, but the indebtedness incurred in this country was incurred in a way I don't agree with, and certainly not like an individual incurs his indebtedness.

Mr. TREADWAY. But the Nation is just one big family, isn't it?

Mr. IZAC. No; but our monetary system is at fault there. It shouldn't be necessary for us to go to the bankers for the money or the credit which is based on the solidity of the Nation, and we, the necessary the Nation. the people, make the Nation.

Mr. TREADWAY. You are not worried, then, that for 6 or 7 years

Mr. Treadway. You are not worried, then, that for 6 or 7 years now the Budget has been getting more and more out of balance, and our extravagance increasing and the public debt increasing, and taxes as well? That is all right, is it?

Mr. Izac. Well, Mr. Treadway, I would say this: If we adhere to the present system and our national debt mounts and mounts and mounts, eventually there will be something akin to a panic in that our honds and our securities will not have full value.

in that our bonds and our securities will not have full value.

Mr. Treadway. Then you are admitting there is great danger?

Mr. Izac. Oh, unless we have monetary reform, absolutely. I would like to see the Congress of the United States issue its own currency, in the name of the people of this country, rather than have the private bankers do so and I certainly will now condense. have the private bankers do so, and I certainly will never condone the making or breaking of individuals in this country by giving or denying them credit as is the custom to do today through the power given into the hands of a few bankers, when it is the right of the American people themselves, because it is their credit that is being bartered.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is that flat money, printing-press money, you are recommending?

Mr. Izac. Well, if you call flat money or printing-press money that which is based on the credit of the 130,000,000 people that make up this Nation, then I will call it with you flat money or mining-press money.

Mr. Treadway. Let us get back to the present monetary system.

I think this is getting rather a long way from the subject of paying old-age pensions, but, assuming that we retain the present monetary system, then have you any worry about the size of the public

Mr. Izac. Oh, I can appreciate that it would go so high eventually that we would all have to be worried, but I don't think the time is anywhere near that we will have to worry until we definitely determine that we can't bring up the national income to somewhere near what it should be, from 75 to 80 billions of dollars. I am convinced in my own mind that if we will bring our national income to that figure, owing to the tax methods you gentlemen have inaugurated, or at least recommended to the Congress, which we have backed up very faithfully, we will be able to balance the Budget and pay off the national debt, because every bit of money that is in circulation under the present tax system is going to pay its share to the retirement of this public debt.

Mr. Treadway. Do I understand that you are saying that by the

Mr. TREADWAY. Do I understand that you are saying that by the adoption of one of these welfare or Townsend bills that the circulation will be such and that taxation will be such so that it will reduce the public debt?

Mr. Izac. I didn't say that.

Mr. TREADWAY. That was the inference that could be drawn.
Mr. Izac. Well, I will interpret that this way, that if we will increase these payments directly to the old people, there certainly will be more money in circulation.

Mr. Treadway. There is no new money, is there?

Mr. Izac. There will be a better distribution of what money there is.

And, furthermore, this tax, and the money that is paid into this fund, the raising of this fund from which you pay the older people, the raising of that money by taxation—that money is not going to be used for any other purposes, certainly until it is determined that be used for any other purposes, certainly until it is determined that you have so much money that you can use it for other purposes. In other words, if this gives $60 a month, we will say, to every old person above a certain age, and then all of a sudden business gets so good that it brings in twice that amount of money, I would be in favor of reducing the age to put more people on the pension rolls until we have all the younger people absorbed in gainful employment, and then if it brings any more money, certainly I see no reason why it should not be used to pay off the public debt.

Mr. Treadway. Just an observation: When I was a comparatively young man—and I don't admit to too many years yet—this idea of caring for the old people was not carried to the extreme it is now. In other words, as a young man I felt some obligation to take care of my parents. That doesn't seem to be fashionable any more. They want the Government to do it.

Mr. Izac. Yes, Mr. Treadway; but supposing there were no children, in those days those folks went to the poor farms. I think we have progressed beyond that stage. I wouldn't want to see us go back to the days of the poor farms. I think this is an age in which we can produce all that the people need. I can't see age in which we can produce all that the people need. I can't see why we should deny the old people any of these things. I believe we owe it to them. If we can't do it without placing a tremendous burden on the rest of humanity, I would say, "Well, of course, there is a reasonable doubt there," but I believe we can produce all and more than we need.

Mr. Treadway. Just one more observation, but before I make that observation I want to admit that I consider you one of the greatest optimists I have ever heard express views on the possibilities. I congratulate you on your bright outlook for the I congratulate you on your bright outlook for the future.

I have been a Member of this body for some years. Congressman Crowther referred to a billion dollars of interest. We are paying now about $1,000,000,000 a year in interest on our indebtedness. That amount of money more than supported the whole Government, when I first came to Congress. 'Isn't that developing the debt in a pretty rapid manner, so that unless we take an optimistic view of it, that there is no obligation to ever meet that debt, it is disheartening to some of us.

Mr. Izac. Well, Mr. Treadway, supposing you take the income that would come into the Treasury of the United States by eliminating the tax-exemption feature of that national debt, wouldn't you be reducing that billion-dellar newment in interest by you be reducing that billion-dollar payment in interest by tremendous figure?

Mr. Treadway. Of course, there is a matter of moral obligation there. We have already assumed that indebtedness, and the obligations that it represents are practically tax-exempt. You wouldn't want to have the Government or the Congress go back on its word to the owners of those securities today and tax them now, would you?

Mr. Izac. No; I don't believe we could make them retroactive, but I believe we are making a terrible mistake in continuing that policy, because then we would have from the income of this country enough paid into the Treasury to pay the legitimate expenses, I am sure.

Mr. Treadway. We have dealt in generalities so far. Let us get down to brass tacks. You mentioned here $60. Which bill do you favor, H. R. 11 or H. R. 2?

you favor, H. R. 11 or H. R. 2?

Mr. Izac. I favored last year the General Welfare Act, and that was when I was on the steering committee, and until there was dissension in the ranks and they formed into two groups. I was with everyone in favor of legislation for old-age pensions. After they had this dissension I refused to be a party to either. This year I am taking no sides, but I am going to support any bill you gentlemen report on the floor. Either of these bills or any bill better than what we have at the present time. I believe in the General Welfare Act, and although both bills have some features of it. I might not be able to agree that both sides know exactly how it, I might not be able to agree that both sides know exactly how the thing is going to work. But I will support them, because I believe either bill is a vast step in the right direction over what we have at the present time.

Mr. TREADWAY. We have had various types of testimony here in the last month. The proponents of the General Welfare Act seem to think that the range of possible payment was from $30 to $60 per month. Then we had the advocates of Dr. Townsend's measure, so-called, H. R. 2, and they wanted to prorate the receipts from the tax. What do you think is the limitation?

Mr. Izac. The economists with whom we spoke last year said it would be about sixty or seventy dollars, they figured, under the 2-percent transactions or gross-income tax. That, I believe, would satisfy our people. Whether it would give the recovery features that satisfy our people. Whether it would give the recovery leatures that Dr. Townsend is striving for, I don't know, but I do believe it can be balanced against the number of people above a certain age and the number of people below that age who need jobs. In other words, we have to strike a balance there.

Mr. Treadway. I think you mentioned either form of tax, either the transactions tax of 2 percent or the gross-income tax. Which would you prefer?

Mr. IZAC. I like the gross-income tax, but I have never been able Mr. Izac. I like the gross-income tax, but I have never been able to find what the difference is. In other words, consider the gross-income tax—if I receive any money I pay on that money; in the transactions tax, it is exactly the same thing.

Mr. Treadway. Never mind that at the moment. I just want to follow up this one thought. Do you think $60 would satisfy those who are advocating this measure?

Mr. Izac. I helium so.

Mr. Izac. I believe so.
Mr. Treadway. Well, it doesn't satisfy Dr. Townsend.
Mr. Izac. It did last year.
Mr. Treadway. It didn't last Friday.
Mr. Treadway. It didn't last Friday.
Mr. Izac. I haven't talked with the doctor since last year.

Mr. TREADWAY. Two hundred dollars was the minimum.

Mr. Izac. The minimum?
Mr. Treadway. Yes, sir.
Mr. Izac. Well, it was the maximum last year.
Mr. Treadway. Well, of course, it has grown. It is like Topsy—it just grew up. But he certainly testified to that. If you weren't

Mr. Izac. No; I wasn't here.

Mr. TRADWAY. Dr. Townsend testified that he thought $200 was the minimum, and it should be increased within a comparatively short period to $300, and then I asked him what about this $60 proposal and he said: "I would advise all friends of mine to vote against that bill."

We were trying to see whether there wasn't some place we could meet on this thing, but he definitely repudiated the people that said $60 was the maximum. That is all given up so far as he is concerned. He said he would advise his friends not to vote for concerned. He said he would advise his friends not to vote for any such bill as that.

Mr. Izac. Well, Mr. Treadway, last year he told me himself that he asked that that bill be introduced that we know as the General Welfare Act, and economists told him and told us that it would bring between sixty and seventy dollars to the old folks, so they figured.

Mr. Treadway. What has increased it this year?

Mr. Izac. I don't know. The only thing I can say is that two hundred or three hundred dollars a month, if we had that much money, might better be used to lower the age limit of those who money, might better be used to lower the age limit of those who would profit by this division of annuities; the division of the fund among a greater number of people and eventually to the paying off of the national debt. But I can assure these gentlemen of one thing, and that is if you get two or three hundred dollars a month out of a tax of this kind, unless the economists are dead wrong, it would increase the cost of living so high that maybe the two or three hundred dollars a month would be the same as twenty or thirty dollars a month is now under our present economy.

economy.

Mr. TREADWAY. You admit, then, that the larger taxes, the more collected from the tax, the more it will increase the cost of living? Mr. Izac. Oh, I think so. Two percent will increase it a certain amount; 3 percent will increase it more.

mr. 12ac. Oh, I think so. Two percent will increase it a certain amount; 3 percent will increase it more.

Mr. Treadway. Don't you think, in view of the situation in which this committee finds itself today, with the diversified ideas presented to us, don't you think the advocates of this whole system ought to present a united front here of some kind?

Mr. Izac. No, Mr. Treadway.

Mr. Treadway. You don't?

Mr. Izac. I don't think it is possible.

Mr. Treadway. Well, I am inclined to agree with you.

Mr. Izac. Different minds have different viewpoints.

Mr. Treadway. I was just reading an extract from Dr. Townsend's statement here, made on February 17. I made this remark:

"Mr. Treadway. Now, getting back to this matter of the amount of money involved. It would seem, I think, and some witnesses have testified that your figure of $200 was rather high. Judging from that testimony now, I take it you think that figure is too low. You say you could go up to $300?

"Dr. Townsend. It might not be too low to start with, but it inevitably will be too low to maintain a proper standard of living, inevitably will be too low to maintain a proper standard of living, inevitably will be too low to maintain a proper standard of living, if we concede that our business activity is not static; if we concede it is going to grow with the discoveries of science and the application of those discoveries, certainly we are going to have to raise the standard of living for all classes of people."

That is pretty definite, isn't it?

Mr. Izac. Yes. I will say as far as the people of California are concerned, that those I know are interested in this plan, were satisfied with the General Welfare Act as it appeared last year. I have never been sponsored by any of these organizations, I will say to the members of the committee. Neither the Townsend organization supported me nor has any other organization ever supported me, so that does not enter into my argument. My arguments are these: The people of California, and I believe the old people of all the United States, feel they should have a better break under present-day conditions. I agree with them, and I am here to give them the very best I can, and I believe the comam facts of give them the very best it can for them, and I am satisfied these hearings are going to result in something definite being done that is going to better the lot of our old people, so I thank the committee for holding these hearings and for giving me an opportunity to appear before it.

Mr. Cullen. We thank you.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Massingale].

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, I wish simply to announce that I am going to support this measure. I am supporting it because of the fact that I owe an obligation to the old men and women of my district who are in a condition of poverty and misery. There is no hope for them ever to get out of that rut unless Congress takes it upon itself to do something to bring them out of it.

I have seen bills killed in this House before by manipulation. I do not know what the Ways and Means Committee may think of their action in this particular—there is no use in my expressing an opinion—but I fear that in the days to come, when the accounting time shall be, somebody is going to have the idea that the action of that committee was more or less pusillanimous [applause], because that committee has done nothing.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. MASSINGALE. No. They have been in session for 5 months.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it. Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's words be taken down.

The CHAIRMAN. To what words does the gentleman from Michigan object?

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman used the word "pusillanimous." I would like to know if we have to sit here and hear such criticism made of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan insist upon his point of order?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Massingale] will suspend until the words can be taken down.

The Clerk will read the words objected to.

The Clerk read as follows:

When the accounting time shall be, somebody is going to have the idea that the action of that committee was more or less pusillanimous.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee will rise.

The Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Smith of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 6466, certain words used in debate were objected to, which, on request, were taken down and read at the Clerk's desk, and that he reported the same herewith to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the words objected to in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The Clerk read as follows:

When the accounting time shall be, somebody is going to have be idea that the action of that committee was more or less pusillanimous.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot find anything objectionable in those words.

The Committee will resume its session.

The Committee resumed consideration of the bill H. R. 6466, with Mr. SMITH of Virginia in the chair.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, I further want to state in this connection that while I do not appreciate what has been done, I never meant any reflection on the Ways and Means Committee. I am sorry that the Ways and Means Committee did not do its duty as I see it. That is the only thing there is to it.

Now, here is the situation that confronts this Congress: We have these old people. We are not addressing ourselves to the Ways and Means Committee. We have these old, destitute people in America. They are in my district by the tens of thousands, and I know the same is true in every other congressional district in the United States. This bill offers an opportunity to break away from the old and established order of money distribution by providing for a monthly pension to the old people in the United States. It will cost a great deal of money, in a sense, to operate the bill, because you cannot pay pensions unless you have the money with which to pay them. The money, though, becomes a sort of revolving fund, and the main thing about it is that it is put into circulation, and the people that contribute to the fund get it back in the way of increases in business, or, rather, they have a chance to get it back that way. As the matter now stands, there is no chance, no opportunity-the door is shut in the face of our millions of old people. No amount of knocking at the door, no appeals that it be opened, will ever fall upon the unwilling ears of those who now have control of the money system of the

I believe that every Member of this Congress realizes that for the last 5 or 6 years, and perhaps for the last 10 years, there has been little of the restful health-giving and healthsustaining sleep for our old people. They are denied the right to work. They are too feeble, most of them, to work; and if there should come an opportunity to a great many of them to get work, they have not the strength to do it. Adversity overtook them and still has them in hand. Instead of peaceful sleep, interspersed with an occasional pleasant dream, it is easy to fancy these old people in the paroxysm of a nightmare. In fact, these last few years have been years of nightmares to the old. The inexorable economic laws under which we live have just simply forced the old people out, and they are down, and begging Congress for some kind of merciful legislation that will enable them to go the balance of the way with their heads erect and with hope in their hearts that they may escape the potter's field when the time comes to die.

I realize that this bill is not what it ought to be, and I am conscious of the fact that it has been loosely drawn, that it has not been perhaps as carefully worded as it should be, but it is a bill that offers an opportunity to escape the clutches that hold our old people down to poverty of the very worst form—that poverty which neither affords sleep, food, comfort, nor hope. This bill, however, like any other bill, when once enacted and its imperfections arise, Congress can clarify, rectify, or amend, until it shall bring to the people in unmistakable language its purposes and its object.

One of the dangers that beset a person who desires to vote to try to better the condition of our old people is that it is too easy to alibi failure to support any kind of a bill. In the debate on this bill, we have heard some say that it is fantastical and full of dangers and pitfalls, and that it will cost the farmer a lot of money, and that it will cost the workingman a lot of money, and that it may not operate with uniformity against every class of business in the country. I grant that that may be true, but the bill is a step in an independent attitude to change things from our present economic condition to a condition where perhaps something better can be done for our old people.

I believe that nearly everybody in America in the abstract favors a uniform old-age pension law, providing an adequate pension each month so that our old people will not be in continued distress but that they may have sufficient money, deprived as they are by the economy of the time from work or a right to work, so that they may have the necessities of life. The Townsend plan may be a fantasy, and the delirium of the people may not be of long duration, for the people want something like this, but we must at the same time remember that the unfortunate condition of our Nation will justify almost any imaginable proposal for the betterment of those who all of us are free to say need to be protected in a manner better than they are being protected by this great and powerful Government. If there should be anyone who is satisfied with the old order of things and with what we have, of course he has a right to oppose this bill but he ought to be honest about it and he ought to be unequivocal in his statement about it. I have observed Members on both sides of the aisle contend that they cannot afford to support the bill because it is accompanied by what is called a "gag rule" which prevents the bill being changed or amended on the floor of the House and requires that it be voted on as it is written. To me that is not a very good reason to assign for voting against this bill.

Some Members seem to take the position that the Ways and Means Committee should be upheld and that this bill should be killed. I do not think that is a reason for opposing the bill. I do not think the Ways and Means Committee met its obligations in the manner in which it jostled the bill out of that committee, but that does not justify me in voting for the bill or against it. I have the greatest of respect for the Ways and Means Committee, and if that committee feels satisfied with the manner in which they have handled it, that is good so far as I am concerned, because I have to concede to the members of that committee that they did what they thought was best under the circumstances. I do not owe it, and no other Member of this Congress owes it, to the Ways and Means Committee to vote it a shower of roses because of the manner in which they have handled the bill. In casting your vote you are either voting for the interests of the old people or you are voting against their interests, and why not meet the issue that way?

Much abuse has been heaped upon the head of Dr. Townsend, the originator of the Townsend idea of granting pensions to the old. In my judgment, it does not make any difference how much contempt a man may have for Dr. Townsend, it is not Dr. Townsend that you are voting for if you vote for this bill; it is not Dr. Townsend that you are voting against if you are opposed to this bill. It makes no difference how much of a loon you may think Dr. Townsend to be, how insincere you may regard him, or what you may think of his conduct in appealing for and receiving each year huge sums of money from our unfortunate old, you have to accord him this niche in the hall of outstanding people in America: He is the individual that sold the American people on the idea of pensions for the old people of the country, and you must say of him that he possessed in a remarkable degree a thought of some sort, even though wild and impractical and visionary, that gripped the imagination of our old people in a manner unknown of any other in recent centuries. Dr. Townsend seemed to have caught the idea that the present economic program has failed this Nation and left our old people without jobs, without money, without food, without clothing, and without anything except a fast-fading hope that sometime, through some kind of legislative program, Congress might act favorably in their behalf. This thought of his gripped the Nation with a religious fervor akin to some of the thoughts and ideals expressed by notables who have gone before him in centuries past. Let us accord him that much recognition because it is due him, and let us not use the stiletto to stab our old people in the heart simply because you do not judge Dr. Townsend to be the kind of man he should be or because you believe he may have extracted money from these old people and not used it properly; or because the bill is not worded with as much elegance as some Members of Congress might be able to word it; or because it was accompanied by a so-called gag rule when it came up for consideration,

There have been many prophecies of disaster to the economic set-up if the bill should be adopted and become a part of the law of the land. It is very difficult for me to visualize a worse economic condition than we already have.

There is another alibi that has been offered in the debate on this bill that is wholly inexcusable. Many members of both parties have tried to excuse themselves from a vote in favor of this bill upon the ground that they have incubating in their own minds a feasible, sensible, workable bill for the relief of our old people that will pay in the neighborhood of $60 per month. This plea comes too late. There has been nothing, so far as the record shows, in the daily lives of these gentlemen who offer these baits why they have not produced them before they began to put in their alibis or excuses for not voting for the bill. True, this bill, according to the way the economists figure it, will not produce any great deal of money—$35 to $40 at the most—then why should any Member lie low and keep his mouth shut until the time comes to vote and spring a pension idea which he says that he has developed that will pay our old people twice as much money as this bill probably offers them?

So far as I am concerned, I am willing to forget all of Dr. Townsend's shortcomings, if he has any, and I suspect he has. I am willing to forget and forgive the Ways and Means Committee if they have not done the proper thing in their report of this bill. I am willing to overlook errors in draftsmanship employed by those in writing this bill. I am willing to forget that lack of wisdom and strength that the bill reflects from its wording, and try to fall in the line of endeavoring to do something that will better the condition of the old people of this country.

We should be on the square with our old folks, and every Member here knows that it would not be a difficult matter, once the machinery is set in motion, to make of this bill a real worth-while bill that will materially improve the condition of our old people and enable them to enjoy the few remaining years that they have yet to live. Congress has the power to do this. No other body in America has it. Unless Congress assumes it and has the courage to act, there is no hope for our old people. I am persuaded that my conscience unerringly directs me to vote for this bill, and I am going to do it.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. COFFEE].

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Chairman, perhaps after 4 hours of heated debate a frenzied statement made in the excitement of controversy can be excused. I hope we will not lose our sense of humor. There are those of us who every 2 years have gone through rather heated campaigns, so when we get on this floor we should have our skins thickened against the jabs that are made by the debaters in the controversy. I am sure the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Massingale] intended nothing personal and no invidious reflections deleterious to the character or integrity of the very fine statesman from the State of Michigan [Mr. Mapes], whom we all honor and respect.

I take the floor briefly, Mr. Chairman, to state that, representing the Sixth Congressional District of the State of Washington, where we have myriads of members of the Townsend clubs actually functioning, I am going to give my vote to this measure, not because I believe it is a measure of perfection, not because I think it is infallible, but because I believe it to be a step in the right direction.

I do not intend to get up here, as do certain other Members of the House on both sides of the aisle, and assume the role about which Shakespeare wrote when he said:

I am Sir Oracle, and when I ope my lips, let no dog bark.

I do not believe any one of us can arrogate to himself those vanities which make him believe he is omniscient on the subject of legislation. Each of us has his own opinion, and each of us comes from a district wherein certain influences are exercised and wherein certain people are moved by what I believe to be laudable impulses. I know that in my district the preponderant sentiment of the people resident there is for the adoption of this bill. Something vital should be done to solve the problems of the elderly of the United States. I am surfeited by the prospect of waiting around here year after year while we spend unlimited sums to provide for ameliorating the condition of the beasts in the fields and the birds in the air and the insects in the ground and for the Army and the Navy and soil erosion and every other thing under God's sun, yet forget the people who comprise the rank and file of the population of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this bill is before this House for debate and vote as the result of insistent demands made for relief by millions of people in these United States. We have temporized and experimented with heterogeneous panaceas and remedies, yet so far, though we have ascended several rungs of the ladder, we are confronted with poignant misery, widespread poverty, cruel insecurity, and economic injustice in our land. The debate today has dealt with the personality of Dr. F. E. Townsend, sponsor of this measure; has embraced arguments to the effect that the bill would eventuate in financial bankruptcy for our country; has been replete with patronizing references to the mentality of those who subscribe to the principles of the proposed legislation. Violent jeremiads have been hurled even at the mild and conservative Committee on Ways and Means because it made possible a vote on the measure. Amazing reflections have been made upon the elderly members of Townsend Clubs, the assertion being repeatedly uttered, in substantial effect, that these aged folks were witless, gullible, deluded, not altogether rational.

Resort has been had to ridicule and scurrility in reference to the Members who sponsored the measure. It has been charged that the bill is ludicrous, asinine, and filled with meaningless jargon and incomprehensible terminology.

Mr. Chairman, you cannot laugh this movement out of existence. It is here to stay. The American people demand that the sword of Damocles of economic insecurity hanging by a tenuous thread over the heads of the majority of Americans shall be blasted out of existence. The American voter is not dull, nor so thick-witted as to accept kidding, complacently, for long. He is conversant with the wealth of the Nation. Our elderly citizen, sitting in his rickety rocking chair at night beside a rusty stove, resting upon a carpetless floor, reads in the daily papers of the antics of America's socially elite. He is not amused, but grows indignant when he learns of the cavorting of debutantes at "coming out" parties, where champagne flows like water and where doting parents vie with each other in putting on lavish displays so as to impress society with their prosperity. The indigent aged are not reduced to laughter by reading of salaries of $100,000 or more paid to the executives of countless corporations, while they face the long night of worry, semistarvation and uncertainty as to what the morrow will bring. Our older fellow citizens in pecuniary distress, read of the more than $15,000,000,000, of gold stored away in the vaults of Kentucky; they read about the $30,000 sable fur coats of America's wealthy women; they read of the priceless jewels and gaudy baubles with which the wives and sweethearts of America's wealthy are bizarrely caparisoned; these elderly see the photographs of the fabulous country estates of fellow Americans; they note that the banks are crowded to the doors with idle money and credit.

No, Mr. Chairman, these needy persons cannot be made to be content for long. They rebel against the curse of a system which visits upon them wanton misery while reserving to a select few luxuries beyond the dreams of avarice. They demand a decent national old-age pension, not based upon a pauper's oath but as a reward for being veterans in the struggles of life. They are battle-scarred from economic contests and feel that in the richest country on earth the specter of homelessness and poverty should be permanently eradicated from their lives. I subscribe to this feeling.

I fully realize that this measure will not pass. It will not pass because of prejudice; because in many sections of the country the needy are not allowed to vote; because of machine politics; because of innate conservatism; because of unwillingness of many Members to embark on a new course; because of lack of comprehension of the details of the plan.

This bill in sum is a recognition of our obligation to take care of the elderly. It provides merely for payment every month of the proceeds of a gross revenue tax to citizens over 60 years of age. It ordains a compulsory spending on the part of the recipient. It decrees security for the aged, contemporaneous with the opening of new avenues of opportunity for the young and the middle-aged. It is a pension and recovery program. It has avoided many of the objections hurled against previous Townsend bills. It means that we are force-feeding into the channels of national business the red corpuscles of new purchasing power, the paucity of which has precipitated America into the economic depression of '29 and following. It is a pay-as-you-go plan and requires no army of officials to enforce it.

It is economical in that it anticipates the war veterans of the future. I insist that if you deny the people this Townsend program you must offer a tolerable substitute. You have denounced it, my colleagues, but you have given us no alternative. You propose to tell the people that though they have asked for bread you will not even give them a stone.

America is saturated now with subversive activities; discontent breeds in ground made fertile by poverty and want. Intolerance is fructifying; racial hatreds grow stronger daily; the General Moseleys and the Fritz Kuhns are abroad in the land spewing their hymns of hatred. Why do we have such seemingly unsound manifestations? Because, Mr. Chairman, we have not been willing to face the situation realistically. We have renovated, repaired, patched, spliced, and otherwise sought to adjust nineteenth-century methods and legislation to the requirements of the twentieth-centry streamlined, technological age.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I shall cast my vote for this bill, fully cognizant of the fact that it will not solve all our troubles but that it will spread more equitably some of the wealth of America to and among those who need its benefits the most. [Applause.]

From the Fawcett Avenue Townsend Club, No. 10, of Tacoma, comes a message by wire in which the secretary, Mrs. Le Vesta Milton, states that this bill will solve our economic problems and give young and old hope for the future.

J. Hold, secretary, and Mrs. E. H. Lee, president, of the Lake City Townsend Club, of route 1, Tacoma, have wired me, vigorously espousing the bill before the House.

Ethel Peck, secretary, acting for the Des Moines Townsend Club, enthusiastically champions the measure.

L. S. Russell, president, wires me that Townsend Club No. 21, of Tacoma, are praying for the passage of this bill.

Dr. D. H. B. Smith, secretary of the Manitou Townsend Club, No. 24, of Tacoma, militantly endorses H. R. 6466 in a wire just received.

F. B. Springer, president, and Elsie Kettlewell, secretary, wire me that the South Tacoma Townsend Club, No. 8, insistently urges the passage of this measure.

L. F. Ellison, president, and Mrs. Laura Moe, secretary, of Fircrest Townsend Club, No. 19, of Tacoma, ask me to use every effort to support H. R. 6466, now under discussion.

Alice M. Gebbers, president of the Horace Mann Townsend Club, No. 15, of Tacoma, has sent me a lengthy wire signed by scores of members, declaring the militant feeling of that club in support of the instant measure. Likewise the Ruston Townsend Club, of Ruston, wires support of this bill.

These and other wires and messages, Mr. Chairman, are indicative of the tremendous backing for this bill in my congressional district.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I suspect my situation with respect to this proposed legislation is different than that of any other Member of this body. In the first place, although I helped the Townsend bills in every possible way for 4 years in two Congresses, yet in two campaigns they unanimously endorsed my opponents, and I was pilloried from one end of my district to the other as public enemy No. 1 not only of the Townsend plan but of all old people. Then last year they endorsed me for Congress in my district over my protest. [Laughter.] I told them they could not possibly do that in the face of the record they had made for me, but they did it. I accepted their endorsement, and I feel that acceptance places me under a moral obligation to support this legislation, although it is far from the bill they think it is and far from the bill we have had before Congress the past 3 years, and until 5 days ago.

Mr. Chairman, if this bill could have been brought in here under the 5-minute rule for amendment it could have been easily amended in three or four highly important particulars, and made a bill that I could support much more heartily. At least, Members could have had the privilege of voting on the amendments. Now it is take it or leave it.

I am in favor of the principle of this legislation. I have believed for years it carried a basis for adequate, decent, old-age pensions in this country, without unduly burdening industry and commerce. I have insisted to everybody from Dr. Townsend down that they ought to give the legislation thorough consideration and allow it to be amended and made workable, but it has always been just in the position that it is in during this Congress. If a man suggested that it could be amended he was considered an enemy of the whole program, and it is at their demand that the bill is before the House today in a situation that prevents its amendment, no matter how beneficial or how necessary such amendments may be.

Even the sponsor of this new bill does not seem to know what is in it, as shown by him in answer to my statement this afternoon that the bill taxes wages. He said it does not. The House now knows that it does. Now, if the author does not know what is in the bill, who does? I know something because I have analyzed and studied all these bills from the first one.

This is the fifth Townsend bill which has been introduced in the House in the last 5 years. I shall insert here the number and date of the introduction of each bill: H. R. 3977, January 16, 1935; H. R. 7154, April 1, 1935; H. R. 4199, February 2, 1937; H. R. 2, January 3, 1939; and H. R. 6466, May 23, 1939—omitting H. R. 6378, withdrawn as defective.

The chief resemblance which the last bill bears to the first is the age limit of 60 years and the requirement that the pensioner shall expend the pension, a not very material requirement in view of the probable amount of the pension which would be realized by the bill. The attorney for the bill is quoted in the press as having said it would produce about $60 a month. Dr. Townsend is quoted as putting it at $50. In my judgment, $40 would be a very liberal estimate.

I believe, and I base the statement upon a considerable study and knowledge of the several bills, that could this bill be considered free from the prejudice surrounding the name of the Townsend plan, under a rule permitting amendment, it would receive a majority in the House.

The first bill introduced, H. R. 3977, provided a flat $200 per month pension, to be paid by National and State banks having membership in the Federal Insurance Deposit Corporation, the banks to be reimbursed by the Treasury out of the collection of a tax of 2 percent on the gross value of each business, commercial, or financial transaction in the United States. The pension was payable whether the tax was collected or not.

The pending bill levies a tax of one-half percent on the gross proceeds or gross revenue of producers, manufacturers, wholesalers, and jobbers and 2 percent upon retailers, trades, occupations, or callings not included in the one-half percent category, and on all personal services, and prorates the proceeds among the pensioners. No tax, no pension. This was a great change.

But a greater change is that the bill abandons the transaction tax of all prior bills for the gross proceeds or gross revenue tax.

There is no substantial difference between the gross proceeds or gross revenue tax in the pending bill and the gross income tax in H. R. 11, the Sheppard bill, which the Townsend movement opposed so bitterly in the election last year.

The transaction tax has from the start been the first article of faith in the Townsend plan. Dr. Townsend, the Townsend Weekly, and all Townsend leaders stressed the transaction tax as the very essence of the Townsend plan. It was the Townsend plan. In this bill the taxes are called "privilege taxes," based on gross proceeds.

If this fundamental change in the tax feature is satisfactory to the proponents of the pending bill, I do not see that the supporters of the Sheppard bill, in which the tax is levied on gross income, have any serious quarrel with it, unless it would be with the reduction from 2 percent to one-half percent on producers, manufacturers, wholesalers, and jobbers, which will reduce the revenue to be derived from those major sources 75 percent. Certainly the opposition to the legislation can have little complaint against this change.

I desire briefly to call attention to three other material changes involved in the several bills which have been introduced in the House from time to time. The first and most important of these changes is with respect to the tax on wages. H. R. 3977, the first bill, exempted all personal services; H. R. 7154, the second bill, taxed all personal services; H. R. 4199, the third bill, exempted all personal services; H. R. 2, the fourth bill, exempted all personal services; H. R. 6466, the fifth bill, taxes all personal services.

On a separate vote this would again go out of this bill.

The second change is with respect to income deduction from pension. H. R. 7154 provided for the deduction of income from the pension. A person having an income of $2,400 per year would not be eligible for the pension, and his income below $2,400 per year would be deducted from the pension. In my judgment this was a wise provision.

Under the pending bill every person over 60 years of age is eligible for the pension, without regard to the value of his property or income. Such pensions will reduce the common level received by needy aged people. The limitation ought to be restored.

The third change is national-bank exemption. H. R. 6466, the pending bill, exempts national banks. They are not exempt in the other four bills. The singling out of national banks for exemption calls for very serious consideration. I ask the question, Who did this, and why?

I have no criticism of the making of these material changes, except the one singling out national banks for exemption, but I have a complaint against the fixed rule of the Townsend movement that once a bill is introduced it cannot be considered in the committee or the House for amendment; that it must be passed as is; and that any suggestion of amendment is construed as hostility to the whole plan. Every Member who has been here the past three Congresses will know what I mean. The sponsors exercise the right to change it at will and without notice.

During my study and consideration of these several bills it has been my view that they furnish the basis of a national pension system adequate to support the aged people of the country in decency and comfort, on a scale at least approximating pensions provided for those favored classes in the public service and in many large private industries. No one can contend that the present pension system is adequate or satisfactory.

The Social Security Act does not afford sufficient means for the lower income groups which come within the contributory titles, and there are large groups which do not come within those titles at all and are left to the old-ageassistance provisions of the act. It is my belief that this legislation properly amended would furnish additional revenue to build up a decent and adequate system of old-age pensions in this country, without unduly burdening industry and commerce, and the blame is not altogether on Congress that this work has not been undertaken in real earnest. The objections I have pointed out do not affect the principle of the legislation and are easily remediable by amendment. If the bill passes the House it will go to a body that never legislates under gag rules. The great changes made in this bill and which cannot be amended under the rule might furnish an alibi for voting against the bill, but I have a long-standing prejudice against such

Frankly, I should not like to see the minority outvote the majority on this bill. The Republican Party is entitled to no such break. Many people call the Townsend plan absurd, but it is not half as absurd as the idea being built up in Townsend circles that the Republican Party is its friend, or that the Townsend movement has anything whatever to look for in the election of a Republican President and a Republican Congress.

All of the old-age benefits being paid to the people of this country, all the unemployment benefits, all the social-security benefits of whatever nature, have been written upon the statute books by a Democratic Congress under a Democratic President. When they get better benefits they will get them from the same source.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON].

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, to me there is an element of unreality about the serious consideration being given today to an old-age pension scheme as fantastic as the pending proposal. This is the seventh draft of an old-age pension plan to be sponsored by Dr. Townsend and his followers, and while Dr. Townsend has written a letter to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HEN-DRICKS], to the effect that this bill is the last word and all who do not accept it without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i" will not be considered loyal to the cause, Dr. Townsend frankly admitted before our committee that he had serious doubt about the constitutionality of a plan to impose a tax, earmark it for a separate trust fund, and automatically distribute it for the benefit of less than 10 percent of the people. Consequently, Dr. Townsend left our committee definitely under the impression that the purpose of the pending measure was largely to test congressional sentiment and that his real dependence was being placed in a constitutional amendment, the advocacy of which, of course, will enable his organization to carry on for a good many years to come. In view of the current rumors of large sums being collected by the Townsend organization from elderly persons who expect a liberal pension in return for their contribution, the committee requested Dr. Townsend to make to it a frank disclosure of his receipts and disbursements which he declined to do.

For the first time in my experience in the House and for the first time in my recollection of House proceedings, we are called upon to vote upon a measure that, so far as I can ascertain, does not have the approval of a single member of the committee that reported it to the House or a single member of the Rules Committee that gave a rule for its immediate consideration; to vote upon a plan for old-age pensions that has been pending before the House in one form or another for the past 4 years and before the Ways and Means Committee of the Seventy-sixth Congress for the past 3 months, yet there came to its support not a single representative of industry, of labor, of agriculture, or of any other group except members of the Townsend organization and a few Members of the Congress who in their political campaigns of last year promised to support such a pension scheme.

But for the very considerable number of old and needy people in the country for whom we all have the deepest sympathy and who should no longer be misled and deluded as to the practicality of this method of contributing to their welfare and happiness, such proceedings would be the acme of legislative horseplay.

And so it is we find ourselves today faced with the duty and responsibility of making a solemn and detailed explanation of the unsoundness and unworkability of a pension plan which should be self-evident from the mere statement of it. I will not take the time of this House with a discussion of the minor unworkable phases of this Utopian and fantastic scheme such as the proposal to give every person over 60 years of age a pension up to $200 per month (and ultimately according to Dr. Townsend up to $300 per month) regardless of their present personal income and regardless of the fact that the 1938 produced income in this country of approximately $64,000,000,000 divided among approximately 130,-000,000 people would give an average income of less than $500 per person, with an average income on the farm of considerably less than that. I will not discuss our inability to compel a recipient of a pension to spend it all in the same month in which it is received and only for goods produced in the United States. I will not discuss the millions of tax returns that would be required and the army of enforcement agents, although Dr. J. Frederic Dewhurst, an economist of the Twentieth Century Fund, who testified before our committee regarded that as a major difficulty. He said:

With approximately 10,000,000 enterprises and self-employed persons in the United States there would be about 10,000,000 monthly tax returns or about 120,000,000 annually in addition to about the tax returns or about 120,000,000 annually in addition to about the same number of pension checks. It seems probable that an army of investigators, possibly as many as 200,000 or 300,000 would have to be added to the Federal pay roll in order to check up on the payment of taxes by a multitude of small concerns, and under H. R. 2, on the expenditure of pensions by recipients. * * * A few years ago I attempted to obtain from certain tax experts estimates of what the administration of the Townsend plan, so-called, or Townsend bill, in its form at that time, would cost, and the best estimate I could get was that it would be something between $500,000,000 and a billion dollars a year really to enforce the bill as it was drawn up at that time.

After some 300,000 Government employees get their $200 per month and subsistence and travel allowance out of the proposed fund, we may wind up, if the prediction of economists of the affect upon business of so great an increase in the national tax burden be fulfilled, of having more beneficiaries of the Townsend scheme on the Federal pay rolls than we have pensioners.

It is taxes that hurt and give us pause and it is the taxes of the pending bill that I will discuss. However, before leaving the subject of administrative cost and difficulty, I feel I should call attention to the fact that H. R. 6466 that has been substituted for H. R. 2, since Dr. Dewhurst testified, increases rather than diminishes administrative difficulties. Take, for instance, the case of a farm wife who has a dozen eggs for sale. If she sells those eggs to a consumer in a nearby village she must report to the Government and pay a transaction or sales tax of 2 percent of the sales price of the eggs, but if she sells the same eggs to a merchant she would report and pay a sales tax of only one-half of 1 percent. The bookkeeping on the farm to keep these different types of transactions separate, the making of the required reports under heavy penalties, and the remittance at the required time of the sales taxes due the Government would, of course, be simpler than the task of the Treasury sleuth to ascertain when some farmer had reported a onehalf of 1 percent sales tax when he should have reported a 2 percent sales tax.

As previously indicated, not a single witness representing labor, industry, or agriculture appeared in behalf of this bill, but numerous witnesses representing those groups, as well as the general public, appeared in opposition to it. For instance, the American Federation of Labor, speaking through Mr. Matthew Woll, stated its position thus:

I thought I had made that very clear in my original presentation, where we said, of course, we do not believe in any system that would give benefits to all people regardless of need, and the Townsend bill, of course, is predicated entirely upon right and not on the matter of need. There is no question about it, we are opposed to the Townsend bill and the principle underlying it.

In answer to the question-

And any economic system that would take purchasing power from one group, which is spending all the money it earns, and give it to another group, would not likely increase the purchasing power of the public generally, would it?"

Mr. Woll replied:

Nor would it be a sound economic system . . We realize that the wage-earning group, representing the great mass of our consumers, is the one ultimately to bear the burden of taxation, no matter what form it takes.

We have in this honorable body a large number of Members who loudly proclaim that they are the friends of labor. I say to them that no true friend of labor can vote to put a tax of this kind on the backs of those who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow.

We have in this House a very considerable group that loses no opportunity to express its grave concern over the plight of agriculture. Samuel Fraser, speaking for the Florida Citrus Producers' Trade Association, which constitutes 80 percent of the citrus industry of Florida, for the United Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Association, representing most of the fresh fruit and vegetable interests of California and Texas, for the National League of Wholesale Fresh Fruit Distributors and the International Apple Association, representing nearly every apple cooperative in the United States, said of the proposed tax on agriculture:

I think it would be ghastly.

When asked by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Representative McCormack, if he thought any man who represents a farming district would be voting for the best interests of the farmer if he voted for such a tax, Mr. Fraser replied:

No. To my mind, it is like a devastating funnel-shaped cyclone, noting across the land sucking up and destroying everything it touches and leaving ruin in its wake. It would pyramid all the costs on an industry which is in no condition to pay, say 20 percent of the consumers' dollar goes for food. Take the case of apples: In one transaction they might go through five hands, and instead of 2-percent you would have 10-percent tax before it got that the consumer's hands or they may move through more into the consumer's hands, or they may move through more hands but the effect is the same, the tax might reach 20 percent. I cannot see anything but a ghastly flasco if you start a transactions tax.

To the same effect was the testimony of Dr. John Lee Coulter who said:

Our farm population would be hit both ways, by higher prices for that which they had to buy and lower prices for that which they had to buy and lower prices for that which they had to sell. * * Not only would it add the 2 percent at each point where imposed, but it would become part of the cost at that point and then the new 2 percent would be imposed on that in turn, so that it would be cumulative and pyramided.

This would apparently gradually increase costs and in turn prices of commodities. But it would not add to the value or the price of farm products. The prices which the farmers would receive or farm products. The prices which the farmers would receive would not be directly affected and certainly not improved in level, but indirectly would be forced constantly lower and lower. * * * Whereas on the other side, the commodities which farmers must buy would cumulatively be priced higher and higher. So that the disadvantage of the agricultural population would become cumulatively and matter. tively greater and greater.

Any man who votes for a tax of this kind on agriculture is voting to sink, without a trace, not only the fresh-fruit and vegetable industry of this Nation but likewise agriculture in every phase thereof.

Before the days of influencing public opinion by means of the radio, those who knew their way around in politics counted heavily upon the good will of the small retail merchant in the towns and at the crossroads. Dr. David R. Craig, president of the American Retail Federation, speaking for its membership in 25 State-wide associations and 7 national retail trade associations, and likewise speaking for the American National Retail Jewelers Association, the Cooperative Food Distributors of America, Mail Order Association of America, National Association of Chain Drug Stores, National Retail Dry Goods Association, National Retail Furniture Association, and National Shoe Retailers Association-and those several organizations cover the distributors of what we eat and what we wear, the chairs in which we sit and the beds in which we sleep, to say nothing of what my lady wears by way of rings on her fingers and bells on her toes-told our committee that the American Retail Federation "wants to go on record as unanimously opposing the principle of the multiple sales tax as proposed by H. R. 2 and H. R. 11."

The proponents of the bills-

Said he-claim that it would increase the velocity of the circulation of money and thus increase the rate of general business recovery; that it would increase purchasing power; and that it would increase employment. A realistic analysis, however, shows that none of the expected results can be hoped for, and, in addition, that the method of raising the pension money would produce exactly the opposite results.

Any scheme to speed up the circulation of money by taxation must take the money from those who spend it slowly, or not at all, and hand it to those who, by law or necessity, must spend it rapidly. In these plans, however, the multiple sales tax takes the money from those who already spend it as fast as they get it. The older people must spend it within the month, but the younger people from whom it would be taken would probably spend it within the week. * * * The Brookings Institution has estimated that even in 1929, almost three families out of four were unable to purchase food for an adequate diet. These groups are the ones on which the multiple sales tax would fall most heavily. They cannot be accused of hoarding. The velocity of the circulation of money is not likely to be increased by this method.

method.

The same conclusion comes from an analysis of the effect on purchasing power. To take money from those who have hardly enough and transfer it to the same kind of people simply because they are a little older is not a plan for increasing the sum total of purchasing power. Moreover, the impounding of tax receipts during the first 4 months under either the Hendricks or the Sheppard plan would deal an initial blow at purchasing power by taking a substantial portion of it out of circulation immediately.

He and numerous other witnesses whom I will not undertake to quote but whose testimony appears in full in the printed hearings, explain how the pyramiding of the multiple sales tax would put the independent merchant and the small distributor out of business and concentrate the distribution of food and clothing in the hands of a few powerful corporations. Certainly there must be a few friends of the retail merchant left in this body who would not wish to crush him and drive him into bankruptcy by a sales tax of this character.

Much reliance is placed by the proponents of this bill upon their theory that the requirement that the pension be spent the month in which it is received would produce such increased velocity of circulation of currency and such increased demand for goods and services that the national income would rapidly go up to the point where not only would no one complain of taxes but that all who are paying the taxes would clamor for bigger and better pensions in order that the taxpayer might thereby become more prosperous. It has been truly said that no idea is good unless it will work, and not a single economist appeared before our committee and stated that this new get-rich-quick scheme would work. On the contrary, numerous economists of both national and international reputation condemned it as being thoroughly unsound and impractical. It was condemned by Dr. Sumner H. Slichter, of Harvard University, who said the bill would have a deflationary effect. Said he:

But have you considered the curiosity, the oddity of the proposal that transactions will be stimulated by taxing? That is the essential argument behind the bill—people will spend money faster. Why? Because you tax them when they spend it. Does it make sense? Why should people rush into spending money faster if every time they do it they meet a tax?

It was condemned by Dr. Frank D. Graham, of Princeton, who said:

Obviously a tax on transactions is an unlikely method for increasing production and trade. The theory of the proponents of the bill must therefore be that the expenditure by the recipient of pensions, paid out of the proceeds of the tax, will stimulate production and trade more than the tax will retard them. This could be true only if the payers of the tax would have hoarded, that is, failed to spend either for consumption or investment, some part of the funds out of which the pensions are to be paid to persons under contract to disburse them in short order.

* * The payers of the tax are deprived of exactly the same amount of purchasing power as will accrue to the recipients of the pensions and the taxpayers will typically be the generality of citizens who are in the habit of spending their incomes as they receive them. The only exception will be certain wealthy citizens who may refrain from spending, or investing, their resources for more or less lengthy periods. These, however, are the very people who would find it easy to evade the tax, since they do not have to spend on consumption more than a small percentage of their income and can either refuse entirely to disburse the rest or may invest it but once, and thus reduce the rate of turn-over of their investments to zero.

The upshot is likely to be a reduction rather than an increase

The upshot is likely to be a reduction rather than an increase in the velocity of circulation of money and a consequent decline in production and trade. The tax would in any case be highly regressive in that it would fall with the greatest proportionate weight on people without property or savings, rather than on those who have resources under no necessity of being turned over, and therefore incapable of being brought within the scope of a trans-

David Cushman Coyle, writer on economics and a consulting engineer, said of the theory that the proposed sales tax would increase prosperity:

I am unalterably opposed to both the Townsend and the general-welfare plans, because of the kind of taxation proposed in those plans. I believe that these tax plans, being of the nature of sales taxes, would depress business, lower the national income, and overcome any good effects that might flow from the old-age pension itself.

Dr. Paul Haensel, of Northwestern University, an economist of national reputation, said:

As a tax measure the transactions tax is not based on any reasonable or sound principle of taxation. It is all-embracing without discrimination, even more so than the gross-income tax. From the standpoint of the technique of collection, it is simply a mockery and an insult to the average American citizen who is expected to file sworn-to returns every month, even when he has to pay $1.01 only each time. This is the best way to make the country a nation of wholesale perjurers and chiselers and to create tremendous opposition.

A ten-billion yearly levy on all economic transactions will require a tremendous redistribution of national income, particularly since the proceeds from it will go to a comparatively small group of citizens (old pensioners). Through this tax, which will be paid by the large body of all consumers, the consumption of some people (producers and earners) will be reduced very considerably. What does it mean when pensioners receive $200 a month? It is asserted that this money will go to the support of somebody else. This is a fundamental mistake. The pensioners will buy food, clothing, shoes, toys for their grandchildren, etc., and this will almost immediately disappear in their consumption. After that is over, to pay the $200 pensions next month the Government must again take away the necessary funds from the younger working population. If I were the happy pensioner, I would wear a new overcoat every year, but others who contributed to my pension will have to reduce all their purchases to the same amount. Imagine that all pensions would have been paid in goods (at the choice of the pensioners). They would at first have been taken away from the producers, and there would have been that much less left to them and simply a redistribution of the national produce would have taken place. Money exchange does not alter the situation in the least degree; money that the Treasury will pay to the support of old people must be extracted from the rest of the population and nothing is added to the total amount of national income, on which only the whole population is living. There is no revolving fund. What old people will spend on buying commodities will be consumed in the form of raw materials, transportation, factory expenses, labor, etc., which constitute only the aggregate parts of the national income; nothing is added by buying and consuming by the pensioners themselves.

Prof. Paul Studenski, professor of economics at New York University, said:

University, said:

Contrary to the impression given by the authors of these plans, their operation will not result in the creation of any new purchasing power. The plans would involve, in the main, merely a transfer of purchasing power from the producer groups to the aged nonproducing population. The transfer involving, as it does, between seven and nine billion dollars of purchasing power during the first year, or approximately 13 percent of our total national income, is colossal in character. It is difficult to gage the full extent of the repercussions in our economic system which such a huge, immediate, and continuous transfer of income from one group of our population to another would produce.

The proposed taxes on transactions or so-called gross income, despite their misleading low rate of 2 percent, if ever enacted, would prove to be the most burdensome taxes in the history of this country. The 2-percent tax under either plan, applicable as

The proposed taxes on transactions or so-called gross income, despite their misleading low rate of 2 percent, if ever enacted, would prove to be the most burdensome taxes in the history of this country. The 2-percent tax under either plan, applicable as it would be to each successive turn-over in the production of goods, would make up a total burden of between 10 and 25 percent of the cost of the final product. It is obvious that industry will not be able to absorb such a burden and that the general level of prices would rise simultaneously with the imposition of the tax and commensurately with the rise in the cost of production. The rise in prices would be especially marked in the case of those goods which are the results of the efforts of many enterprises each of which handles the goods in a different stage or production, and where, consequently, the tax would be pyramided many times over. * *

The taxes would destroy thousands of small enterprises which handle a product only in a single stage of its production, while sparing large integrated undertakings producing goods from the raw to the finished stage. The taxes would be shifted to the employees in the form of reductions in wages and a speeding up of work, with the result that the wage earners affected would shoulder a double burden, since they would not only be receiving fewer dollars in their wages but each dollar would have a reduced purchasing power. The burdens on the poor, other than the aged themselves, would be crushing. * *

In my opinion, it is doubtful whether our economic system could withstand the severe shock which the imposition of the proposed taxes and the disbursement of the proposed benefits would inflict upon it.

Those excerpts from the testimony of outstanding economists should be sufficient to convince any reasonable man that the economic theory underlying the Townsend plan is absolutely unsound and untenable.

Heretofore I have referred to groups in the House definitely interested in labor, in agriculture, in industry, and the distributors of industry's products. There is another group on my side of the aisle of the House that takes pride in upholding the President. It should be unnecessary for me to remind that group that the President has characterized the Townsend plan as a Utopian scheme and his Secretary of the Treasury expressed opposition to it during the hearings. That leaves us but one other group in the House, the group that is advocating and supporting this bill. I have endeavored to point out my firm conviction that a present jump in Federal taxes of 125 percent if we are to provide a $50 pension for those 60 years of age or older or 500 percent jump if the pension is to be the Townsend maximum of $200 per month will result in such economic dislocations it will injure the old as well as the young. But, assuming for the sake of argument, that the plan will help the aged, those who are supporting it have elected to help the members of the Townsend clubs in their districts at the expense of all others in their districts, have elected to aid approximately 8 percent of their constituents at the expense of the remaining 92 percent of their constituents. While that appears to be a strange and unusual choice to be made by one to whom has been delegated under our representative democracy the responsibility of representing all of the people in his district and not just 8 percent of them, far be it for me to impugn the motive of any Member who makes such a choice, since each Member of this House is the keeper of his own conscience. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] such time as he

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I am under no political obligation to vote for this bill, so far as Townsend organization support is concerned. In 1934 Mr. Bert H. Smith, the leading Townsend plan advocate and organizer in my congressional district, was a candidate for Congress against me on the Farm-Labor ticket, and the Townsend plan was the principal plank in his platform. In 1936 and 1938 I also had primary and election Townsend opposition; that is, I had the opposition of the Townsend national headquarters, the State headquarters, and club officials. On October 22, 1938, Mr. L. W. Jeffery, vice president of the Townsend organization, sent a communication to all Townsend clubs in my congressional district, in which he said, in part:

We should not be concerned at this time as to how his opponent stands, whether he is for us or against us. The only issue that should interest the Townsend clubs in the second district is to defeat the incumbent.

The letter then endorsed my opponent.

I am sure, however, that many of the Townsendites with whom I am personally acquainted supported me.

Learning of the above communication, I gave the Townsend clubs in my district a written statement as to my position on the Townsend plan. That statement was, in part, as follows:

(1) If returned to Congress I will do everything within my over to secure a hearing before the Ways and Means Committee on the Townsend plan.

(2) I will do everything within my power to bring the plan up for consideration in the Congress so that debate may be had and a vote taken and all Members put on record.

(3) I will not promise to vote for the Townsend plan without amendments

(4) I will give careful consideration to any amendments offered. I will vote for all amendments that I believe will be beneficial, and I shall support any bill resulting from this consideration that I believe will be of benefit to the country, and especially our

I have not changed my position.

Complete hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means have been held. Dr. Townsend's organization was permitted to present any witnesses, make any statements, and file any documentary evidence desired. In fact, the Dcctor stated to the committee and to his followers, through the Townsend Weekly, that he had received eminently fair treatment and that he had no complaint whatever to make.

My second promise was that I would do what I could to bring the plan before the Congress for debate and vote. I had in mind, of course, H. R. 2, which is the Townsend plan as generally accepted. The bill H. R. 6466, which we are now debating, is not the Townsend plan as the Townsendites throughout the country understand it. This bill is before the Congress under a "gag" rule; that is, we are permitted to talk about the bill for 4 hours, and at the conclusion of that time we are compelled to vote "yes" or "no" on the bill without the benefit of amending it in any particular whatsoever. This is sham and farce consideration, but is brought about because Dr. Townsend wanted it that way. I have consistently opposed such methods when practiced by the New Deal. My constituents, including the Townsend followers, are opposed to any system that permits the "brain trust." the President, Dr. Townsend, or anyone else to write "must" legislation, present it to the Congress, and compel the Congress to vote on it without an opportunity of changing and improving.

However, as stated by the gentleman from Florida, Congressman Hendricks, who introduced H. R. 6466, this method is pursued according to the doctor's instructions. The purpose is to prevent the Congress from having anything to say about the bill other than to approve or disapprove what the doctor demands. This means we are to be Dr. Townsend's "yes" men. Of course, I am opposed to any such autocratic precedure.

Now, understand me, Dr. Townsend asked the Rules Committee for this "gag" rule. He does not want any changes. even though they may be for the better, and even though he admits the bill is not perfect. These demands are reprehensible, and the committee can find no excuse in forcing this kind of a vote simply because the proponents demand it. I am opposed to any political strategy that violates fundamental legislative principles.

In this connection let us not forget that the hearings on the Townsend plan, which finds expression in H. R. 2, covered weeks. The testimony submitted to the committee has been printed and comprises a large volume. The Townsend clubs throughout the country have been advised as to the contents of H. R. 2, and expect a vote on that bill. However, on May 23 this new bill, H. R. 6466, by Dr. Townsend's direction, was introduced by the gentleman from Florida, Representative Hendricks, and the Ways and Means Committee, without any hearing whatever on this new bill, reported it to the House "without recommendation." That report should also have stated "without any consideration." gist of the whole procedure is to give the good doctor his way, let him bring any kind of a bill he sees fit before the House, prevent the House from crossing a "t" or dotting an "i," and then compel the House to vote on the bill the doctor presents. Surely he has had his way and can make no complaint.

I said that H. R. 6466 is not the Townsend plan, and in order that I may be absolutely correct, I quote from the Townsend Weekly, which week after week carries this column:

TOWNSEND PLAN IN CAPSULE FORM

The Townsend plan will do three things:

(1) Retire all citizens over 60 from gainful employment in private industry and hire them to be Government spending agents.

(2) Levy a Federal tax of 2 percent on all monetary transactions throughout the Nation, collectible monthly.

(3) Prorate this tax revenue among the spending agents with the stipulation it be spent within 30 days of receipt.

The theory behind the plan is this: There are approximately 8,000,000 Americans past 60 who can qualify. It is estimated half of them are employed and will retire under the plan. Their jobs will thus be thrown open to younger workers, reducing unemployment rolls immediately by 4,000,000.

The bill the Townsendites want is H. R. 2, which carries the above provisions. This bill, H. R. 6466, which we are now considering, abandons the straight 2-percent transaction tax—the heart of the Townsend plan—and substitutes in lieu thereof a gross income or sales tax of one-half of 1 percent on the producer, and a like tax of one-half of 1 percent on the manufacturer, jobber, and certain other middlemen. The Townsend 2-percent transaction tax is then applied to all other transactions. It is stated that the one-half of 1 percent under this bill will apply to 30 percent of the taxable transactions in dollars, while the 2 percent will apply to 70 percent of the transactions in dollars. This, of course, will make the amount of money that can possibly be raised under this bill we are considering much less than under H. R. 2.

The advocates of the Townsend plan in my congressional district insist that it is not a pension plan, but that it is a national recovery program. It is called the General Welfare Act. The recipients under the plan are not called pensioners of the Government, but "authorized spending agents" on the part of the Government. The philosophy of the whole plan is that $200 a month paid to 8,000,000 or more old people and spent monthly will create purchasing power, make more business, put more people to work, and give employment to the unemployed and to the youth. The pamphlet, Townsend organization and which is sold to the followers for 25 cents per copy, on page 14 proclaims:

It has been shown by statisticians that the spending of $2,000 to $2,500 annually in commercial production is required to make possible the permanent employment of one worker.

The Townsend plan will pay $2,400 a year to the old persons. It has been insisted that any sum less than $200 a month would fail to bring recovery and provide employment. In the above publication it is stated further:

A man on Government dole does not stimulate industry. The Townsend plan is not simply a pension proposal, as many uninformed people think. It is not a dole system. It is a program to increase buying power and a demand and market for the production of all industry in America. The market cannot be created by a dole system of $15, $30, or even $50 a month. But this market can be created by retiring our elders on a normal income of $200 a month.

No one knows exactly what this bill, H. R. 6466, will pay to the pensioner-pardon me, I mean the spender. Mr. Arthur L. Johnson, who drafted H. R. 4199, the Townsend plan in the last Congress, who came to Washington with and represented the Townsend organization for a long time, and who possibly knows as much about this plan as anyone, in addition to knowing something about taxes, says that after the payment of administrative expenses, the pension to be received by the old people will be "around $15 a month." Members of Congress have made other guesses. The highest guess I have heard comes from Dr. Townsend himself, who indicates that the bill will possibly pay $50 a month. There are no official estimates, because the Committee on Ways and Means has not given this bill any consideration. Dr. F. Frederick Dewhurst, of the Twentieth Century Fund, prepared an estimate of the average monthly pension that could be expected under H. R. 2, and that table, which was referred to in debate today by the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, shows that the average monthly pension under H. R. 2 could be only $51 a month, allowing nothing for administrative expenses. Now, all concede that the administration of this act would be most expensive, and the $51 would be reduced materially. If these estimates are accurate, it would seem that there is much justification for Mr. Johnson's opinion that H. R. 6466 would pay around $15 a month to the pensioner.

I have called attention to the theory of the Townsend plan and the amount to be paid under this bill for the reason that the bill itself, if put into operation, could not possibly furnish the purchasing power Dr. Townsend claims is necessary to assist recovery, take care of unemployment, and the young people. Surely this is not the bill that the Townsend people want.

I have received hundreds of letters and telegrams from Townsend Club members in my district, and without exception these communications demand that I support the Townsend plan "without amendment." Many of them simply refer to H. R. 2. A typical letter comes from Mrs. W. H. Fugazzi, secretary Townsend Club No. 2, Jackson, Mich., in which she says in part:

We do not want you to vote for the Townsend plan if it is amended, as you have stated you might do. We want it as it stands. If this bill is amended, it is no longer the Townsend plan. We want it in its present form without changes.

Now, of course, this letter had reference to H. R. 2, and is typical of all the others received. The bill H. R. 6466 is vitally different from H. R. 2, as I have heretofore pointed out.

The Townsendites in my district espoused the cause under the $200-a-month banner. They honestly and sincerely believe in the original Townsend plan, and many of them were loathe even to permit a modification of the bill to provide that whatever it yielded should be divided among the pensioners, but "not more than $200 per month" should be paid. Now, the doctor has stated that $200 per month is a "wisp of straw," the purpose of which is to keep up interest in the clubs. This statement was made at a meeting of certain Representatives in Congress who were trying to work out some possible plan to help the old people.

Again it is interesting to note that in the recent hearings before the Ways and Means Committee the doctor claimed that H. R. 2 in operation would shortly pay $200 a month, and that it would pay $300 a month at the end of 5 years. Of course, this is all inconsistent, but it is what the doctor said.

It is very fortunate for everyone that these hearings have been held and printed, and that this vote will be taken. I say this because there has been but one side of the Townsend plan presented to the people up to this time. Dr. Townsend testified that to date more than $3,000,000 has been collected by the Townsend organization from our elderly people for propaganda purposes. Emotional and sentimental speakers have been sent about the country to organize clubs and spread the Townsend gospel and collect the Townsend dimes. The Townsend Weekly and the Townsend literature carry the Townsend message day after day, and week after week, to these old people. Of course, in propaganda of this type the reader gets but one side of the question. If a jury in a lawsuit heard but one side of the case, there is no doubt about what the verdict would be, but when both sides of the case are heard, that is a different matter.

Not a single economist, businessman, representative of industry, labor, agriculture, Government, or finance appeared at the hearings in favor of the Townsend plan. Representatives of the Townsend headquarters and the Members of Congress supporting the plan were the only advocates, and none of them attempted to justify it constitutionally.

A reading of the testimony shows that most of the time of these witnesses was devoted to describing the economic condition of the country, especially of our elderly people, and lauding the objectives of any law that might help the old people. It is one thing to deplore conditions; it is another thing to find a remedy.

On the other hand, numerous economists, people familiar with finance, representatives of such a nonpartisan, patriotic group as the Brookings Institution, appeared in opposition to the Townsend theory. Of course, Dr. Townsend condemns all economists and all persons familiar with taxation and finance. He says that these people have been running the country for 150 years and now it is time to let the old folks, under his leadership, run it for a while. Mistakes have been made, but we have a pretty good country after all, and we do not want to do anything that is going to destroy it.

The Townsend clubs, through Townsend literature and speakers, have been led to believe that the only thing standing between them and the $200-a-month Townsend possibility is the opposition in Congress of "Wall Street," the "international bankers," and "big business." These are the bogymen about whom demagogues prate.

Now, let us consider the facts as we know them and as the printed record of the hearings and this debate show them to be. First, just who is advocating this bill? I have already answered this question so far as the hearings are concerned. There are, however, thousands of conscientious, sincere, earnest, and trusting elderly people throughout the length and the breadth of the land to whom this proposition has been thoroughly sold. These people are acting in good faith; they look upon Dr. Townsend as a Moses who will lead them into green pastures. When I receive letters condemning me severely for not doing just what Dr. Townsend wants at all times, there is no feeling of resentment on my part. There is, however, a feeling of genuine responsibility. I have heard and studied all sides of this perplexing question, and I naturally give consideration to various representatives of groups of our people who are sufficiently interested to give Congress the benefit of their study, investigation, and conclusionsgroups without selfish interests.

For instance, I call as witness No. 1 William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, and representing millions of American workingmen, who, alarmed at what the Townsend plan would do to labor, on May 29, 1939, addressed a letter to the Ways and Means Committee, reiterating the position against the Townsend plan taken by the federation at the hearings on H. R. 2. Among other things, Mr. Green says:

We are convinced that to pretend to offer up to a maximum of $200 a month to all old persons, regardless of need, as is done by H. R. 6466, is both dishonest and undesirable. It is dishonest because no such large sums could be paid to individual annuitants even with the burdensome taxes proposed. The amounts actually paid would be very much under the maximum and would fluctuate from month to month so that no real security would be achieved for those who really need it while others would receive sums entirely unnecessary in their economy.

It is undesirable because it taxes wages and gross incomes with practically no regard for ability to pay and because it offers tremendous incentive to integration of producing and marketing units at the expense of small independent business. The independent retailer, the consumer, and the wage earner will be the losers under this program. A gross income tax of a flat percent cannot be other than regressive in effect. It is a thoroughly bad form of taxation.

The incomes of most wage-earning families are too small to The incomes of most wage-earning families are too small to justify this 2-percent income tax designed to furnish pensions for old persons regardless of need. The wage earners spend now nearly every cent of their wages. No increase in national purchasing power can be achieved by taking money from them to give to another part of the population.

The American Federation of Labor believes in enlarged social security for the Nation, but achieved by reasonable methods. It condemns H. R. 2 and even more H. R. 6466 as wholly unreasonable devices and as unable to fulfill the implied extravagant promise of devices and as unable to fulfill the implied extravagant promise of large pensions on the basis of which they make their appeal.

Surely William Green and the American Federation of Labor do not represent Wall Street or the international bankers.

As witness No. 2 I call Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, representing hundreds of thousands of farmers throughout the country, who, coming to the aid of agriculture, in a letter to the committee dated May 29, 1939, said.

It would be fiscal suicide for the Nation to undertake to pay old-age pensions on the scale provided in H. R. 6466.

Transferring wealth from 92,000,000 consumers to 8,000,000 consumers would decrease rather than increase the Nation's purchasing power. Such a transfer of wealth would disrupt our whole economic system. It would work particular hardship upon agriculture.

Every time a commodity is sold, every time it is transported commercially, every time a wage or salary payment is made, every time an income payment is received a tax would be levied on the total gross amount of the sale, wage payment, or income payment, with no deduction for losses, expenses, or costs of any kind.

Again I say that the American Farm Bureau Federation is certainly not composed of economic royalists or representatives of the international bankers.

As the next witness I call Fred Brenckman, representative of the National Grange, of which Mr. L. J. Taber, of Ohio, is national master, and which organization has a dues-paying membership of 800,000, who, disturbed as to what might happen if this bill should pass, in a letter to the Ways and Means Committee dated May 29, 1939, protesting against H. R. 6466 and other Townsend bills, said in part:

Every man who has social brains and the heart to feel for the wants of the old, the infirm, and the distressed is naturally willing that everything possible should be done to help these members of the human family. However, there is one point that must be kept firmly in mind. It is this: There can be no such thing as personal firmly in mind. It is this: There can be no such thing as personal or individual security that is not based on national security. Any plan that would wreck the United States Government would surely leave each one of us stranded individually. That the Townsend plan would wreck the Government, if placed in operation, cannot be denied by anyone who will think the matter through and who is willing to look facts in the face. Among other things, it violates that sound principle of legislation which should always be kept in mind, namely, the greatest good for the greatest number. Placing our population at 130,000,000, it would tax 120,000,000 people to the point of extinction to give a low ride to the other 10,000,000 people. point of extinction to give a joy ride to the other 10,000,000 people over 60 years of age.

When a responsible organization like the National Grange feels called upon to fight the Townsend plan because it would "wreck the Government," in addition to the active opposition of these other groups, surely no Member of Congress is justified in voting for such a doubtful measure without an opportunity to thoroughly consider and amend. Again may I inquire as to whether or not this is Wall Street opposing?

Another witness, on May 29, 1939, L. G. Luhrsen, executive secretary of the Railway Labor Executives Association, addressed a letter to the Ways and Means Committee in which it is stated that the association is "definitely opposed to this bill." The letter further states:

We understand that this bill is to be considered on Wednesday, May 31, and is not subject to amendments. We, therefore, pray that this bill (H. R. 6466) will be defeated since it is discriminatory far-reaching way with respect to the railroads and approximately 1,000,000 railroad employees.

Possibly all do not realize just what organizations are included in the Railway Labor Executives Association. The letterhead furnishes the information and is as follows:

Affiliated organizations: Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers; Order of Railway Conductors of America; Switchmen's Union of North America; Order of Railroad Telegraphers; American Train Dispatchers' Association; Railway Employees' Department, A. F. of L.; International Association of Machinists; International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders and Helpers of America; International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths, Drop Forgers, and Helpers; Sheet Metal Workers' International Association; International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America; International Brotherhood of Firemen and Oilers; Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express and Station Employees; Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees; Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express and Station Employees; Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees; Brotherhood of Railroad Signalmen of America; National Organization Masters, Mates, and Pilots of America; National Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association; International Longshoremen's Association's Associati way Conductors of America; Switchmen's Union of North America; neers' Beneficial Association; International Longshoremen's Association; Order of Sleeping Car Conductors.

This group includes representatives of the 21 standard railway labor brotherhoods and unions. I have thousands of railroad men as constituents who are members of and thoroughly believe in the integrity of these railroad brotherhoods and unions, and no one familiar with the facts would even suggest that these organizations in any way reflect Wall Street or interests detrimental to the common man and wage earner. They are against the Townsend plan because they believe it would injure them.

If time permitted, I could continue indefinitely repeating testimony from those who are vitally interested and who should know and who agree with these representatives of the farmer, laborer, consumer, and others that the Townsend plan if put into effect would not only demoralize industry but might wreck the Government itself.

The letters from these organizations to which I have just referred are accompanied by analyses upon which the conclusions stated are based. They are too long to here repeat. However, they will be found included in the argument of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton], chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, which will be printed in today's Congressional Record.

Townsend speakers and literature have time and again stated that the Townsend plan will cost nobody anything, that it is self-financing, pays its own way, and therefore cannot be other than beneficial to the country as a whole. They say, "Try it, and if it doesn't work, repeal it." It seems unthinkable that such statements should be made. An overdose of taxation may kill the taxpayer. Repeal would come too late.

Every economist who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee testified that the Townsend plan would cause a rise in prices as a result of the imposition of this pyramiding transaction tax. The amount of the increase would be somewhere between 5 and 25 percent, according to the number of taxable transactions from the beginning to the final sale of the commodity to the consumer. Remember that all these taxes are ultimately paid by the consumer. It does not seem reasonable to me that in these days of stress and unemployment the Congress should be asked to pass a bill that will increase the cost of living by possibly 25 percent, with such slight possibility from a sound standpoint of general benefit to the public. And mark well, the tax is to be levied not according to ability to pay but on the necessities of life, to be taken out of the meager income of those who must eat, have shelter, and clothing.

I have received numerous letters from merchants, especially in the smaller towns and villages, insisting that the Townsend plan would bring money to the community and indirectly help these independent retail dealers. The effect the Townsend plan will have on the small independent dealer will be just the opposite if we are to believe Dr. Townsend. I quote from the hearings at page 622:

Mr. McCormack. All right. I am trying to get your state of mind. When you drive out the middleman and bring the producer and consumer closer together the middleman is closed out, isn't he?

Dr. Townsend. Sometimes; yes.
Mr. McCormack. And the middleman, on the average, is the small and independent businessman. That is true, isn't it

Dr. Townsend. That is right.

Mr. McCormack. And you can't do that without creating another social problem, because that affects millions of people now employed by the middleman.

Dr. Townsend. Let us create all the jobs we possibly can.

Mr. McCormack. In other words, as a result of this bill the middleman will be closed out * * *.

Dr. Townsend. That is going to happen to him anyway under the present competition.

Mr. McCormack. In other words, he faces extinction?

Dr. TOWNSEND. Yes

Mr. McCormack. Don't you think we should try and do something to preserve the man?

Dr. Townsend. No; I don't. I think he is a useless appendage in the profit scheme Shades of other days! Are we to follow Dr. Townsend, abandon our traditional local dealer, and become bootlickers of centralized trusts and monopolies?

Dr. Townsend later reiterated this same belief in other parts of his testimony. I agree with the doctor that if the Townsend 2-percent transaction plan ever becomes a law, the large chain store and the mail-order house can manufacture its own commodity, sell direct to the consumer, and in this way eliminate all the way from 4 to 10 transactions at 2 percent tax each. It does not require much intellect to conclude with the doctor that this would be the end of the small independent retail dealer. These small independent dealers are the backbone of many communities in the congressional district which I represent, and I shall not knowingly be a party to passing any legislation that is going to put them and their employees out of business, out of employment, and possibly on relief or on W. P. A., unless, perchance, they should be above the age of 60 years and entitled to the Townsend gratuity.

President Roosevelt and Dr. Townsend are in agreement in policy in one particular at least; that is, they both believe in spending other people's money. Under H. R. 6466 these old people are going to get anywhere from $15 to $50 a month, yet they are to be penalized if they do not spend it all within 30 days. There might be some reason for requiring this spending in connection with the Townsend $200-a-month plan, but if the recipients are to get the amount provided for in this bill, then this spending provision is ridiculous. It is just some more window dressing to make believe that this is the Townsend plan as the old folks know it.

Dr. Townsend believes in the principle of enforced spending and has had that principle embodied in this bill. quote from his testimony as shown on page 652 of the

Mr. McCormack. Do you believe in the principle of enforced spending?

Dr. TOWNSEND. For this coming generation; yes. Mr. McCormack. Do you not believe in saving, then?

Dr. TOWNSEND. No.

Here is another example of where the country is asked to spend itself into prosperity. The word "thrift" seems to be foreign to present-day thinking. The country cannot any more spend itself into prosperity than an intoxicated man can drink himself sober, the New Deal and Dr. Townsend to the contrary notwithstanding.

One of the greatest deterrents to recovery is excessive taxation. The chairman of the committee was right when he said that the people of the country are already tax conscious. and that if the Townsend plan ever became effective they would be taxed unconscious. The homeowners, the farmers, the people who pay rent-in short, all the people who liveare at this moment finding it almost impossible to meet the demands of their Government in tax money. Yet the Townsend theory is to make people prosperous by taking away from them more of their earnings in taxes. We cannot tax ourselves into prosperity any more than we can borrow ourselves out of debt. Yet this is the largest tax bill ever offered to the Congress. If the Townsend $200-a-month-pension plan were adopted, and 8,000,000 people in the country took the pension, it would add $19,200,000,000 to the Federal tax roll. If 10,000,000 old people took the pension, it would add $24,000,000,000 to the tax roll. This would mean $706,401,271 additional taxes to the State of Michigan, if 8,000,000 took the pension, or $883,037,460 if 10,000,000 took the pension. Now, as a matter of fact, there are approximately 12,000,000 people in the country above the age of 60, and, if I read human nature aright, most of them would sign up to get back a part of this tax money. Putting it another way, the statisticians and tax experts in the Committee on Ways and Means advise that the Townsend plan would impose an average tax burden upon every man, woman, and child in the United States, in addition to all other taxes now paid, of $185 per year, or more than one-third of our present per capita income of $547.

The bills H. R. 4199, H. R. 2, and H. R. 6466 are all clearly unconstitutional. Time prevents a legal argument. However, every Member of Congress recognizes the unconstitutional features. In fact, in explaining the bill, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS], its sponsor, stated that "it has been made as nearly constitutional as possible." No one favoring the bill has argued its constitutionality. In fact, Dr. Townsend stated before the Ways and Means Committee that he was going to ask for a constitutional amendment. It has been stated here in debate that leaders in the Townsend organization have told Members of Congress that they did not expect or want this bill to pass," because they were going to start agitation next for a constitutional amendment. Insincerity of this type is much to be deplored. A constitutional amendment would require a two-thirds vote of both the House and the Senate. It would then require ratification by three-fourths of the States of the Union, unless submitted by the new method employed when the eighteenth amendment was repealed. If that method were pursued in this case, it might be possible to have action taken by all the States within a year. However, in my judgment, there is no possibility of two-thirds of the House and Senate submitting or the States ratifying a Townsend constitutional amendment. Further, if a constitutional amendment is required—and the leaders of the Townsend movement know this-why do they continue to agitate the people and keep the clubs operating, rather than proceeding to the heart of the thing at once?

When the roll is called today there will not be over 100 votes for the Townsend plan. If we could have a secret vote there would not be 5 votes in the House for the plan. This is bound to be disappointing to the old folks back home, who have been told otherwise. I do not quarrel with the Members of Congress who, without proper information, made promises to vote for this plan. There is no excuse, however, for continuing a course which is wrong after one has the facts.

The old people are at this time receiving some consideration under the Social Security Act. If this bill, H. R. 6466, were enacted into law it would repeal that part of the Social Security Act now benefiting, even though in a small degree, the elderly people of our country. Suit would undoubtedly be brought in court at once to test the constitutionality of this law, and it would take at least a year to reach a conclusion. In the meantime, the social-security features would be repealed, and these old people who are now receiving pension would be out entirely.

The old people back in my district who are watching, waiting, praying, and expecting this Townsend pension do not know as much about this constitutional matter as Dr. Townsend and the Townsend leaders do. Club officers and speakers talk only about the benefits to be derived from the pension. They stimulate the hopes and bolster the beliefs of their adherents. Possibly they do not know the whole truth. However, there is not a Member of the House or a leader in the Townsend movement, including Dr. Townsend, who has any idea that the Townsend plan could possibly pass this Congress.

This is not true of the old folks back home who are keeping the Townsend fires burning and paying for the propaganda that keeps the movement alive. There are hundreds of members of Townsend Clubs in my district who will be greatly disappointed when the roll is called on this bill. They have been led to believe, and do believe, that this bill will very likely pass this Congress. Some of them have made their plans along this line. Hundreds of them have sent me letters and telegrams within the last 24 hours urging me to vote for the Townsend bill because they believe that one vote might be the deciding factor. None of these telegrams from my district cost less than 50 cents, and it is distressing to receive a telegram from some old person whom I know is getting along with the bare necessities of life in order to follow out the instructions which the clubs received from the Chicago headquarters to wire or write their Congressman

I have talked with many Members of the House about the necessity for greater consideration for our elderly people. The present Social Security Act is entirely inadequate, and I shall vote and work for any legislation that will give proper pension and consideration to our respected senior citizens; but I will not be a party to hoodwinking them, to robbing them of their nickels and dimes, to making them believe that they are just about to get something that every informed person knows they are not going to get. Understand me, I do not condemn all of those who advocate $200 a month for all our citizens above the age of 60 years, regardless of whether or not these people need the money. If these advocates are sincere, their judgment is entitled to respect. On the other hand, I do condemn anyone who preaches a philosophy to these distressed old people which he himself knows is impossible, not sound, and cannot be put into effect under the Constitution.

I have been in Congress for some time. I have undoubtedly made many mistakes. Some of my votes have probably been wrong, but all of these votes have been the expression of my best judgment with the information at hand at the time the vote was cast. Following this rule, I shall be constrained to vote against this bill, and I feel confident that time will vindicate not only the sincerity and soundness but also the humanity of my vote. For 6 long years many old people have been expecting the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. It is time they should know the truth. If every Member's vote is dictated by his conscience, they will know the truth.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gifford].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in 1935 this Townsend plan was a burning issue. I am sure that the fires have somewhat abated since then. I took the floor for about an hour on January 8, 1936, in opposition to the proposition and invited opposition to my viewpoint regarding it. I have not had to change my mind since. It is still a fallacy. Very few speeches have been made on the floor either for or against the Townsend plan. You would have little difficulty in collecting them. Some of you enthusiastic Townsendites may now be greeted by certain of your friends in this way—"I don't feel like myself today." "Congratulations," you might retort.

Surely some of our friends have not felt right today, and are really on the spot as has been stated. I am not so blind that I cannot see that this vote is for purely political purposes.

It is not because you want the old people to have their day in court; ch, no. We are not deaf, and we have recently heard frequently of the plan of the majority party to put some Members on the spot, especially those Republicans from New England. Put me on the spot as often as you like. I have been for a long time definitely located. I gave this scheme much attention and study when it was first presented. I have been telling my people of the fallacy of the thing, and I really think that the argument I made in 1936 and circulated prevented the snowball from rolling up in my district. Why do you not explain to these people in your districts the impossibilities of their realization of such an economically fallacious proposition? They have enthusiastic organizers. When 25 members of the Ways and Means Committee listen for some 4 months to testimony and can see nothing to recommend it, I should feel decidedly queer to vote for a measure with such a complete official endorsement.

Also, the Rules Committee seems unanimously against it. Oh, no, the majority merely wishes to embarrass our friends who have flirted with the plan and obligated themselves so that they feel they must conscientiously go through with it, having accepted the endorsement. What an unfortunate position. I asked in 1936, and I now repeat, "Under section 9, would not the stock market be forced to close down?" doubt some of you want it closed down. No civilized nation could proceed without the peoples' market place. Under section 9 many classes of the people would not be able to continue in business. It is suggested that the man who does not need a pension would not take it. Of course, he would do so. I do not subscribe to this doctrine "Pension by right." I want to give a liberal pension to all those who really need one. But think of the W. P. A. neighbor with children to support who, just because I am over 60, must contribute to my support and pleasure in order that I may go to sunny California or bask on the sands of Florida. There is something about this nearly unanimous support from Florida and California that irks me a little. I do not wish my poorer and perhaps less fortunate neighbors to be taxed for my benefit, just because I had reached the age of 60. I fear they would have little affection left for me.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. GIFFORD. Always.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the gentleman kindly state to the Members of the House what particular part of the great State of California there is that irks him?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, I said we wanted to get this pension that we might lie down in ease under the sunny skies of California. I might like to be lazy like some other people.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That would not irk the gentleman, would it?

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not know that the gentleman grasps the meaning of the word "irk." Just what is the gentleman's understanding of the word "irk"?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think under the circumstances I do understand it.

Mr. GIFFORD. It would not be irksome to some, but I think it would be to me to live even in California and not be allowed to work. [Laughter.] As long as I can I want to work. I do not want my poorer neighbors to support me. You Democrats asserted that you believed in having taxes paid by those who are able to pay. Under this you wring taxes from people who are not able to pay. This vote is just a political "gag" to get many Members on the spot. Massachusetts will probably be heard from later, by the gentleman from Boston [Mr. McCormack]. He may ridicule the fact that the Republicans promised the Townsendites they would do everything to bring this measure on to the floor for a vote. They were quite honest in this promise. But when that plank was laid before the convention in Massachusetts I immediately left the convention and went off by myself, because I could not possibly agree even to that. [Applause.] How could I agree to bring a matter to the floor and then strongly oppose it? How could the Ways and Means Committee do this thing? I cannot approve of it. I felt it my duty to leave that convention. But the Republicans were sincere in their promise to help bring the matter to a vote and they have done their duty. It is quite possible that I took the wrong attitude in the matter. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bender].

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to follow my good friend the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gifford], who referred to the burning fires of some years ago and said that the fires had burned out, I do not know anything about that, but I do know the condition that our old people are facing in Ohio. I do know the condition that our people generally find themselves in. That is what concerns me. It is stated by so many people that this bill does not meet the situation. That may be true. This measure is presented to us in a form that we cannot possibly amend. If it goes to the Senate I am sure they will want to make corrections over there.

When an individual says he is for a $60 a month pension, and at the same time says he cannot vote for this measure he is not being very consistent. The most optimistic view is that this bill will provide a maximum pension of $57 a month.

There is nothing inconsistent in a Republican voting for a measure like this, as this measure is not raising expenditures or raising money by placing a burden on the shoulders of this generation and the coming generations by subterfuge. This is a pay-as-you-go proposition. If you vote on every other proposition on a pay-as-you-go basis, I am sure we will have more intelligent voting in this House.

I was a member of a legislative body for 10 years before I came here. So many times members would get up and say, "I am for the idea back of this bill, but this is not the right bill." I am here to vote for any bill that will provide an adequate pension for the aged of our State and country. I am for any bill that will provide decent living conditions for the aged of the country.

You ladies and gentlemen who are for another bill, bring that bill in tomorrow, and we will vote for it. This is the only bill that we have a chance to vote for today, so I am going to vote for it. I will vote for any reasonable bill that you bring forward, but bring in your bill and let us see what your alternative is. You know, you can easily kill a proposition by laughing at it and ridiculing it. But our old people are not getting any benefits from this Congress by being ridiculed. I am not saying that this is the right bill. This is the only way that has been offered thus far. This is the first opportunity I have had to vote for an old-age pension. I do not care what the name of that proposition is. I do not care under what name you bring it in, but I say we owe it to our constituents to bring out a measure which will give them the relief which they so sorely need.

In the many years before the depression the aged men and women of our Nation were not clamoring for assistance. Industry was not turning away its workers when they reached the age of 45. Sons and daughters who were gainfully employed were taking care of their fathers and mothers. Factories were giving their employees generous pensions when they reached the age of retirement.

That picture has been completely altered in the Roosevelt era. Our old folks today are set adrift, all too frequently without resources of their own. They are cast off by industry not because of vindictiveness but because industry under the New Deal is striving desperately to keep its own head above water.

The desperate position in which our aged citizens find themselves today is a perfect reflection of our deepening economic crisis. I am convinced that our national predicament will grow steadily worse until we shall change the entire direction of our Federal policies.

Meanwhile, it is my earnest conviction that this proposal offers hope for a temporary revival of national spending power. I am not certain that the method prescribed by the proposed bill will yield funds sufficient to finance the pension plan. I am not certain that the bill in its present form will operate smoothly in its essential features.

But I am convinced that it is necessary for the people of our country to take care of the old men and women who are the fathers and mothers of our land. We owe them kindliness, not harshness. We owe them reverges not scorp.

not harshness. We owe them reverence, not scorn.

The proponents themselves concede that their program is experimental. If it works the Nation's economic distress may be alleviated. If it fails we shall discover that failure speedily, and we shall not hesitate to correct it. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. White].

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I believe that present pensions fall short of real needs and I favor adequate provisions for the aged and the crippled. However, the consideration of H. R. 6466 today is a snare and a delusion. This proposal is no more like H. R. 2 or the pension ideas that thousands of people have been advocating than the man in the moon.

There have been no hearings on this bill. No amendments are permitted. In this form it is unconstitutional. It is not even presented for serious consideration and adoption. Very obviously the bringing of this bill onto the floor in the present manner is an insincere movement on the part of some of the New Deal bosses in which they make a hollow mockery of the hopes and aspirations of tens of thousands of old people.

It is a slippery piece of business, both false and futile. I will not be a party to this misrepresentation and manipulation. My vote will be cast "No." [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. Munpt].

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, I have listened attentively to the entire debate today on this matter of old-age pensions, and after over 4 hours of it, which I have tried to weigh and evaluate to the best of my ability, there are two facts which stand out of the whole situation like skyscrapers on a desert. The first fact which commands special attention, in my opinion, is the un-American "gag" rule under which the New Deal majority of the Rules Committee insisted this bill be considered; and the second fact is that in large part the most important issues involved in this legislation have been the least discussed in the majority of speeches heard here today.

In the first place, let me discuss briefly this "gag" rule barring all constructive amendments and making a hollow mockery out of the business of representative government. Rumors around the halls and in the cloak rooms to the effect that the New Deal high command was asking for a closed rule preventing amendments and corrections of certain obviously hastily written sections of this bill in order that the whole pay-as-you-go pension program could be the more easily killed took on the appearance of fact today when we were denied the privilege to consider this important legislation under an open rule.

I resent the fact that again today, as on several previous occasions in this session of Congress, the New Dealers who dominate the Rules Committee with a top-heavy majority and a partisan purpose have sought to "gag" the House, to deny us the opportunity to exercise our rights as legislators, to insult in this instance the integrity of millions of our aged citizens who are sincerely working for the passage of an honest pension bill, and to attempt to condemn this type of legislation to an early death by denying Representatives elected to legislate even the elemental right to propose amendments or perfecting supplementary clauses to this bill.

I have always held that the whole system of old-age pensions in America is important enough to deserve a full and fair hearing on the floor of the House and I deplore the fact that now when we finally have the matter before us for consideration a few men in high places in the Democratic Party can still deprive us of utilizing these hearings for adding improvements and clarifications to the bill now before us. Unfortunately, therefore, even now when the pay-as-you-go system of old-age pensions has its long-awaited day in court, it is disappointing to witness the court leaders restricting our action to a specified phraseology for the sly purpose, as is known to every man in this House, of dividing the friends of honest pensions and multiplying our enemies.

THE GAGSTERS COMPLICATE THE ISSUE

We are consequently confronted with but a single alternative today—we must vote "yes" for this bill as it is with the hope that if it reaches the Senate, that body, untrammeled by "gag" rule domination, will insert and add certain needed corrections and amendments which will increase the equity with which this bill would operate, or else we must vote "no" and condemn to defeat for this session not only the hope of a respectable pay-as-you-go pension program but also any hope to free this country from the patent abuses and gross injustices of the present Social Security Act insofar as it pertains to old-age pensions. So our choice is complicated by these "gagsters." It would be bad enough to be confined to voting for or against a bill which the "gagsters" have removed from our customary powers of corrective amendments, but in this case our decision is complicated and the issue confused by the fact that we must choose between this bill as presently drawn and the Social Security Act as presently operating.

Apparently America as a whole desires some type of national old-age pension program. By our vote on this measure each of us is faced with the opportunity of making our influence felt in favor of one type of pension program or the other. Mark you, there is no way for any of you to vote on this bill to express disapproval of old-age pensions as suchthis decision is simply between the present social-security program of old-age benefits, with its eventual trust fund of over $40,000,000,000, and the bill before us, with its specified tax for pensions to be paid on a pay-as-you-go basis. In this vote you must cast your lot with one pension program or the other or sit with your hand over your mouth. A vote for H. R. 6466 is also a vote to repeal the old-age features of the Social Security Act. A vote against H. R. 6466 is a vote to continue the social-security set-up as is. It has become a matter of take it or leave it with the boys in the saddle cracking the whip, barring amendments, limiting debate, and giving us only this one or the other option as we witness this altogether too realistic preview of what democracy can actually dwindle down to when we permit elements of dictatorial technique to dilute the tonic of selfgovernment.

H. R. 6466 OR A TRIUMVIRATE OF TAMPERINGS

For me it is easy to decide which course I prefer to see America follow. With a present national debt of over $40,-000,000,000, it impresses me as a fatal rendezvous with bankruptcy itself to continue this country on the program now called for under the Social Security Act as presently operating with its predicted trust fund of $47,000,000,000.

Not only that, but rumors were started on the floor today of impending changes to be proposed by the Ways and Means Committee which would defer increasing the payroll taxes upon which the trust fund feeds, move up the time for starting the pension payments, and increase the benefits of the act in an Alladin-lamp array of suggestions which represent a triumvirate of tamperings which any schoolboy realizes means an even further unbalancing of our National Budget and a still greater national debt. It is one more example of the New Deal's altruistic axiom of robbing the baby's bank to pay for his father's holiday and I am therefore glad that H. R. 6466 which is before us has the courage and the clear sightedness, whatever else may need amending in the bill, to call for the forthright repeal of the old-age features of the Social Security Act. For me, the matter-of-fact and Nation-serving provisions of sections 18 and 19 of H. R. 6466, repealing as they do the most expensive features of the Social Security Act, make it clear which way I should vote to best serve the interests of both constituents and country in this important decision.

I have given more time and study to the problem of oldage pensions than to any other subject since I have been in Congress. I have attended the committee hearings, read the reports, participated in discussion meetings, and sought information wherever I could find it on this subject. I think I came to this study with an open mind and I know that I came to Congress with no pledge of any kind to any group or individual to either support or oppose any specific type or kind of pension program.

Together with most of you, I am sure, I came here ready to be convinced whether the present Social Security Act or some new type of pension program would best serve both the oldsters of America and the future of our Nation. For that reason I have done all within my power to help get this legislation out on the floor for what I hoped might be a full and open discussion here in the House and for that reason I am, of course, doubly disappointed that to get the bill out of committee it was necessary to pay the price of submitting to a gag rule which in the mind of the majority party of this body will make it just a jack-in-the-box to pop out in the open for a few hours' discussion and then be crammed back again until another political oracle gets another sign from his messiah that it is time to play politics with pensions again.

TWO PENSION PROGRAMS CONTRASTED

Now, in the time remaining, let me discuss with you the second fact which has impressed me singularly in today's debating-the fact that the biggest issue before us has received the slightest attention. As I see it, colleagues, our decision today is to choose between two different methods of trying to develop a Nation-wide program of the greatest usefulness. Neither name-calling, flights of fancy, nor hot tempers will aid us in this decision. The one method is our present Social Security Act, which I indict on several grounds. In the first place, it threatens our very national solvency itself by virtue of the fact it calls for a stupendous trust fund which thus far, at least, has become more of a slush fund for New Deal extravagances than a fund held in trust for eventual pensioners; in the second place, I indict the present program because while its pay-roll taxes are passed along to all consumers and its burdens are therefore universally shared, it restricts most of its benefits to certain groups and classes employed in large groups and entirely leaves out in the cold about 90 percent of the people of my State, for example, where farming and private employment predominate; in the third place, because of the varying ability of States to engage in dollar matching, it does not give equal treatment to all sections of the country, whereas all sections are equally subjected to the increased living costs which always follow pay-roll taxes.

On the other hand, H. R. 6466, now before us, avoids each of these injustices and weaknesses. It is set up on a payas-you-go basis and will eliminate the specter of what has prophetically been called our "$40,000,000,000 blight" by making the accumulation of this huge trust fund unnecessary, while its taxes may also be passed along in part to consumers the present bill treats all groups alike in distributing its pensions, and the farmers of my State will fare as well as the laborers of Detroit or Boston in the old-age pensions they receive; and finally, citizens who attain old age in one State will be treated as fairly and as generously as citizens of similar age in every other State as the "accident of geography" will be eliminated from the many hazards which already attack old age.

PAY-AS-YOU-GO VERSUS BORROW-UNTIL-YOU-GO-BROKE

Our decision therefore reduces down to this, inasmuch as it is generally agreed that America is to accept a national responsibility for old-age pensions; should we adopt the proposed program under H. R. 6466—without amendments, due to the congressional censors who have imposed a gag upon us, but with the earnest hope that the Senate will iron out any wrinkles which must necessarily be leveled for efficient operation of the program-with its pay-as-you-go feature and its sound underlying principle of a universal tax for uniform pensions equally available to all or should we continue the old-age provisions of the Social Security Act with its borrow-until-you-go-broke features and its unsound and unfair underlying principle of a specialized tax-passed along to all-for unequal pensions available to some and denied to others, depending upon occupational happen chance and geographical accident?

There is no escaping this decision—each Member who votes on this bill, and I hope it is a recorded aye-and-nay vote, must declare for one program or the other. He either votes to perpetuate the present unsound and insolvent system of favoritism for the few in the matter of pensions or he votes to repudiate it by repealing the old-age features of social security and substituting therefor the principle of a universal tax for uniform pensions equally available to all. As for me, I shall vote for the latter principle. Unless better parliamentarians than I can yet develop a method for voting for a better pension program than H. R. 6466, I shall vote in favor of this bill at the conclusion of this debate, and I urge you, on both sides of this center aisle, to do likewise. DIVIDENDS VERSUS DECEPTION

In so voting, I am unable to predict the size of the pensions which will result for our aged if this bill passes. The sponsors have fairly enough agreed to divide the net returns of the special tax for old-age pensions among those receiving pensions—we all hope this will be an ample fund. Personally, I neither share the enthusiasm of this bill's most ardent claimants nor do I share the alarm of its gloomiest opponents. Somewhere between these two extremes the history of this bill's experience will be written. As history unfolds and as experience indicates, H. R. 6466 can be amended and altered, modified and corrected to do better the job it is destined to do. Tax rates can be changed, tax bases altered, details of administration revised, exemptions extended, and mistakes corrected without violating its fundamental principles of pay as you go and a universal tax for a uniform

Later Congresses will have to modify and alter and amend as dictates of experience provide, because social legislation of this type has never been perfected at first draft and some day, surely, a wiser and less partisan majority leadership will realize the futility of putting a gag on suggestion and a censor on perfecting amendments.

Happily, however, if this bill passes, it can neither bankrupt the country nor increase the national debt and in its passage it will add to the new hope it brings to the elderly citizens of this country the added encouragement to all that the stultifying spectre of a $47,000,000,000 trust fund will be removed from the pathway of progress and pay-as-you-go cash dividends of whatever size the tax provides will take the place of borrow-until-you-go-broke deception as a basis for old-age security in America.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW].

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I very much regret that our highly esteemed Ways and Means Committee has not seen fit to exercise its collective genius in perfecting the pending bill, H. R. 6466, before sending it to the floor of the House. Everyone, including its sponsors, admit that the bill is not perfect.

Under the circumstances, however, under the gag rule that has been adopted, the bill cannot be amended and must stand or fall as it is. If the bill is recommitted it will go back to an apparently hostile committee, a committee which intends soon to bring forth certain amendments to the Social Security Act in the present belief that this bill will be defeated.

A previous speaker has stated that no body of labor or capital has asked for this bill. In that connection it must be remembered that employed persons in certain classes come under the Social Security Act, but it must also be remembered that the old folks we are attempting to benefit here cannot be benefited by the pension plan of the Social Security Act. They are either already too old or they are not employed by industry and hence not eligible under the Social Security Act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while I was opposed in the late election by the Townsend organization, I am pledged to and believe in a fair pay-as-you-go pension plan for the aged, and believe such a plan should be adopted at this session of Congress as a substitute for the present investment-fund pension plan of the Social Security Act.

I believe, under the circumstances that this bill should be passed over to the body on the other side of the Capitol's dome where its Finance Committee may consider it and perfect it in order that we may have an opportunity to make a proper plan the law of the land. Something constructive must be done and done now for our old people.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAWKS].

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Chairman, this bill, in my opinion, is a recognition on behalf of the old people back home of the inadequacy of the present Social Security Act. We would not have had a Townsend plan or a Townsend bill or any other old-age pension bill before us today if the Social Security Act originally had not been just a downright political measure.

In the campaign of 1938 I accepted the endorsement of the Townsend group of my district. I did not speak for their plan. / I did nevertheless accept their support, and I would be less than half a man today if I did not support the only piece of pension legislation that has been brought to this

While it is apparent that this bill, H. R. 6466, was hastily thrown together, and a large part of it is inconsistent with sound economics and highly intricate in its administration, the feature of a pay-as-you-go basis for pensions appeals to me greatly. It is my opinion that if we are ever to have a sound and adequate old-age pension we will have to adopt a pay-as-you-go principle and do away with the present ridiculous social-security plan. Under the present Social Security Act the Federal Government has collected taxes from the laboring people and their employers in an amount exceeding $1,000,000,000, and the only evidence that this money was collected is a big I O U down at the Treasury Department.

It is hard to imagine that anything could be more fantastic than the present act, but because it is a typical piece of New Deal legislation, and, further, because the New Deal still has a very comfortable majority in Congress, we can expect little or nothing during this term of Congress. You new dealers have played terrible politics with the misery of our people, both in pensions and relief. And, thank God, the responsibility is yours and not ours.

The Ways and Means Committee reported this bill without recommendation after almost 5 months of study on the general principles of social security, and you obtained from the Rules Committee a gag rule which typifies the worst in political maneuvers. I hope that when we have concluded the debate and the voting on this bill that every Member of this great body will have definitely impressed upon him the absolute necessity for adequate, reasonable, and sensible oldage pensions.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWKS. I yield. Mr. BUCK. The gentleman wants to be fair I know.

Mr. HAWKS. Yes.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman realizes that after the rather lengthy and strenuous efforts of the Ways and Means Committee they introduced in the House a bill containing rather widespread amendments of the Social Security Act, a bill which liberalizes the provisions of the Social Security Act materially; so this is not the only act of this nature that will be considered.

Mr. HAWKS. I would remind the gentleman from California that I have not seen a draft of the proposed amendment to the Social Security Act.

Mr. BUCK. It is available to the gentleman; it is printed, and if he wants a copy it is available.

Mr. HAWKS. I understand we are going to have debate on that subject, but this bill is before the House today; and I campaigned in 1938 for adequate pensions.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HAWKS. No; I cannot yield further.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE]. A PAY-AS-YOU-GO BILL

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the proposed revision of the Social Security Act moves further in the direction of an unbalanced Budget. I am unwilling to be put in the position of defending a move in that direction.

The headlines in today's papers describe that revision bill to which the gentleman has just referred. They read, "Benefits Increased Now; Tax Boosts Postponed." That is the sugar-more out, less in.

The bill before us, H. R. 6466, carrying faults as it does, moves in the opposite direction. It is a pay-as-you-go bill, at least.

And I am reminded that most Republican platforms call for an old-age pension system financed by pay-as-you-go taxes.

The late Ogden Mills, former Secretary of the Treasury, in his book entitled "The Seventeen Million," urged a simple, straightforward old-age pension based on a widely distributed tax without all the red tape, records, and confusion of the present two-headed social-security system. This bill moves in the direction of simplicity and is self-financing. Those who urge waiting for the revision of the Social Security Act must defend its deficit financing and its double book-keeping and the permanent accuracy of the 44,000,000 individual record cards that already have been set up. I am unwilling to accept that foundation for a discussion of what should be done.

The bill before us is not perfect, but it proceeds on a principle that is sounder as a foundation for a system of oldage pensions, the principle of a self-financing, simple annuity system, to which each recipient will, in the course of time, have contributed according to his ability. His entitlement to benefits will not depend on his politics, and the amount will not be based upon somebody's personal opinion of his habits and needs, but all persons will be treated alike.

True, this bill is imperfectly drafted. It has references to section numbers that do not exist. When the transactions tax was dropped for the gross income tax, apparently two sections were inserted and later sections use the wrong numbers in referring to earlier paragraphs. That can be ridiculed as it has been ridiculed here today, but such arguments do not go to the issues involved. Under any normal procedure such things would be corrected by perfecting amendments without an objection.

True, the bill before us has some unfair features—exemption of National banks and not of State banks, exemption for chambers of commerce and not for labor unions, but those are oversights that would be amended normally on the floor if the gag rule had not been applied. It comes with poor grace for those who decreed the gag rule to chide anyone about mistakes of that kind in this bill.

Look to the Social Security Act, which has been on the statutes now for some years and still carries such unfair and unequal treatment, which you are only now proposing to revise in the bill to which reference has been made. That act still seeks to tax officers of some lodges as employees and to count honorary officers of commercial clubs as paid employees. It still excludes large groups of employees from its benefits. It still levies a forced loan against wage earners, promises to repay them with interest some sweet day, and then puts an I O U in the theoretical cash drawer and uses what would have been private purchasing power if left with the workers to finance a political spending program.

True, there is uncertainty as to how much the gross-income tax will yield. I speak of this point with considerable interest. We tried a gross-income tax in South Dakota. The results were disappointing. The day H. R. 6466 was introduced, May 23, I learned that it substituted the gross-income tax for a sales or transportation tax, and wired our present State director of taxation, Mr. J. H. Bottum, for the facts on our experience. Under date of May 24, 1939, his reply letter says:

When the gross-income-tax law was passed in South Dakota, it was estimated that the revenue therefrom would amount to $9,300,000. The actual yield, however, fell far short of this figure. The last year the law was in operation the collections amounted to $2,814,000. The following fiscal year an additional $583,000 was collected. You can see, however, that the total revenue, under this law, was never greater than $3,300,000.

He points out, however, that only a portion of the tax was ever collected and that the South Dakota law prevented the tax from becoming a part of the purchased article. There is no such restriction in the bill before us. At the same time, it seems probable to me that the tax will not yield what is expected. But I call to your attention this fact—that it will not pay out more than it takes in.

It may be only $17 as some say; it may be only $43; it may be $51, but whatever estimate is correct, that will be the amount paid.

Mr. Chairman, I have not been deluged with letters and telegrams on this bill or on the Townsend plan as a whole. My district has the number of Townsend clubs you could expect where deflation, drought, and depression have buffeted the people with bank failures, crop failures, and New Deal disappointments. But, owing to the fact that I did not make the matter an issue in my campaign, and possibly because it is generally understood that my only pledge is to give careful, unbiased consideration to any question of importance that comes before us, my mail has not been heavy on this subject.

When asked what my course of action would be, I have stated that I would seek and support a movement to get a fair hearing for the bill with open consideration on the floor of this House. Any subject that is as widely discussed as this deserves that. But to call this 4-hour debate under a rule which permits no amendments of the bill a fair hearing is to mock the meaning of plain words.

I do not know who is responsible for the gag rule under which this bill is before us. Last night, one of my friends on the other side of the aisle remarked to me that he thought the President had made a mistake in insisting upon action at this time, that it was probably intended to put the Republicans on the spot, but that it was embarrassing a lot of Democrats. I do not know who insisted on the gag rule, but whatever leadership dictated such a course, I would caution to beware of what Edward Markham once called "The long, long patience of the plundered poor." If the people, finally impatient with rules and parliamentary procedure, rise and strike blindly some day, let your minds recall how you bound their Representatives today.

Some uncalled-for ridicule has been heaped today upon the man whose idea grew into the great Nation-wide surge for old-age pensions, Dr. Francis E. Townsend. I have never personally had the privilege of meeting Dr. Townsend. But he once practiced medicine in a county seat in my district, Belle Fourche, a frontier cattle town in those days. He is remembered there as a kindly gentleman who believed in trying to help folks. A daughter lives today in Hill City, a town not far from my home. Her townspeople speak of her and a brother who visits there with the highest esteem. The name of Townsend needs no eulogy at my hands. He has never posed as a great lawyer or a great economist but he has lived as one who would be a friend to the old folks and a helper of the young folks.

I am reminded, today, of another old man who believed in helping folks to freedom. Some folks called him queer. Probably he could not have written an Emancipation Proclamation. I am sure he could not have phrased an amendment to the Constitution, but, today, children in their young years learn to sing:

John Brown's body lies amouldering in the grave, His soul goes marching on.

And I am not so sure, but that when we who debate technicalities and look for legal language will have been long gone and forgotten, song and story will tell of a man whose body lies moldering in the grave but whose passion to help folks gave this country the real inspiration to do away with poorhouses and do the decent thing for our older citizens.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has 12 minutes remaining.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I differ with my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gifford] in his interpretation of the Massachusetts Republican platform for 1936. I quote verbatim from that platform:

TOWNSEND PLAN

Realizing that there are millions of thinking citizens throughout the Nation who have studied into and believe in the principles of the Townsend national recovery plan as embodied in the bill bearing the title of the General Welfare Act of 1937 (H. R. 4199), but more popularly known in public discussion as the Townsend national recovery plan, we pledge the entire Re-publican delegation in the Congress to work for a full discussion at the earliest possible moment.

As there may be many good citizens in the State who do not concur in the economic advisability of the plan for national recovery as advanced by Dr. Townsend, we desire to make it definite that this plank in our platform does not commit the Republic lican Party of Massachusetts to the merits of the plan itself, but does insist that it has earned the right to consideration by the Congress without further delay.

That consideration has certainly been given to the plan of Dr. Townsend and to every other scheme that has been presented to the Ways and Means Committee for old-age The Republican Party has kept its pleage to the voters of Massachusetts.

If time permitted, I would like very much to defend the position taken by the Ways and Means Committee. I realize that we are being criticized, very severely criticized, for making no report.

Mr. Chairman, as one of the minority willing to assume my share of the discredit which has been cast upon the Ways and Means Committee by reason of the nature of the report on the pending bill, I particularly call attention to the fact that in the committee, 13 of 15 Democratic members a majority of the committee—led the way in reporting the bill without recommendation and without hearings.

It is very easy to explain this situation. For months we have been having hearings on social security, including the former Townsend and general-welfare bills. Three months elapsed from the time Dr. Townsend agreed to submit his proposed amendments before they reached the committee. Then the Townsend advocates, in and out of Congress, asked for an immediate report on the amended bill without recommendation. It was impossible to grant hearings at the late date at which the amended bill was submitted in view of the insistence on speedy action on their part.

It seems to me there are two major factors in the criticisms that can be rightly directed against the Ways and Means Committee. First, yielding to the insistence of the friends of Dr. Townsend. Second, the willingness of the majority to make a report of this nature, in which the Republicans joined, although we did not have committee control nor were we needed to contribute to the report as made by the 13 Democratic members of the committee.

Therefore, let the blame rest where it belongs, on the shoulders of the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. BUCK. Did the gentleman say there were 15 Democratic members voted to report the bill out without recommendation?

Mr. TREADWAY. I said that 13 members on the Democratic side voted to report the bill out-a majority of the committee. Two of the Democratic members voted against the motion to report the bill without recommendation.

Mr. BUCK. Did any Republican member vote to report the bill out with recommendation?

Mr. TREADWAY. We did not. That motion was never offered. I am not saying that we did not join in the committee's action.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. No; I cannot yield further.

Mr. BUCK. Why did not the Republican members show the statesmanship their speakers have been calling for by joining the two of us who voted "no"?

Mr. TREADWAY. I said two members did not vote for the motion. The gentleman from California was one of the two Democratic members voting "no."

Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further.

Mr. Chairman, in closing may I say that for my part, I have more than carried out my obligations to the friends of the Townsend program.

I therefore feel free to vote on this bill in accordance with the wishes of the majority of my constituents and with my own conscience.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck].

Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement Mr. BUCK. recently made that this is the only pension bill or bill protecting the aged that might be considered by the House, I think it is proper to call the attention of all Members to the fact that H. R. 6497, which is the bill that the Ways and Means Committee will report some time next week under an open rule, is now available for distribution and has been introduced by Chairman Doughton. Look it over before you vote tomorrow.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Johnson].

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, as one Member of Congress who has pioneered in advocating and fighting for fair and adequate old-age pensions for all of our needy old people, I shall cast my vote against this fantastic, impractical, utopian dream, the so-called Townsend plan.

When I first began advocating adequate pensions for our aged people I was criticized and actually ridiculed by some of those in the district I have the honor to represent who now pose as the only real friends of our old people. Many years ago, at a time when old-age pensions were decidedly unpopular, I introduced one of the first bills ever presented to Congress proposing Federal old-age pensions. That was long before the world ever heard of Dr. Townsend or his fantastic cure-all plan.

Mr. Chairman, I stand ready to give my active and enthusiastic support to any fair, sane, and reasonable legislation to aid our deserving old people that has any possible chance of ever being enacted into law. No one, not even the proponents of this pending bill, pretend to say that the bill will pass either House of Congress. It is common knowledge that this bill would get mighty few votes here if Members thought there was the remotest possibility of its passage, and fewer still if a secret vote were taken. It is not here for the purpose of securing any possible help to our millions of needy and the deserving old people who have been fooled and deceived into the delusion that it lacks only a few votes in this Congress in order to enact this measure into law.

Advocates of the so-called Townsend bill have repeatedly stated on this floor this afternoon that this bill presents the only opportunity that Members will have of voting to liberalize the present inadequate and entirely unsatisfactory old-age pension law. That is offered as an excuse for voting for this ambiguous monstrosity by some Members who know that the Townsend bill is full of loopholes and meaningless phraseology.

The gentleman from California [Mr. Buck], an able and distinguished member of the Ways and Means Committee, who preceded me, made it plain that an opportunity will be offered all Members of the House to liberalize the present law within a few days, when legislation is presented to this House to amend the Social Security Act. This House has been assured that these proposed amendments will be brought here under an open rule, which means that all Members will be given ample opportunity to offer any amendments they may choose to present.

May I say in this connection that unless the Committee on Ways and Means presents to this House amendments to materially increase and liberalize benefits to our aged citizens I give notice here and now that such amendments will be offered from the floor of this House. [Applause.] That the present law is wholly inadequate and in many respects indefensible is generally conceded. But merely because few, if any, of us are satisfied with the present law is no reason or excuse to vote for this makeshift measure, even though it does have the blessing of Townsend and his organization.

My objection, Mr. Chairman, to the pending Townsend bill is not primarily that the old folks of my district and State have been repeatedly told that they are to receive $200 per month provided they continue to send their dimes to a man who admits under oath that he has taken in over $3,000,000 of their money that they could ill-afford to part with, nor is it because sponsors of this bill now claim that their pyramided sales tax, if enacted, would pay only from $50 to $75 per month. Nor is it for the reason that national banks are exempt from the provisions of this bill, while State banks are proposed to be taxed, as indefensible as all this is. The most serious objection is that the sponsors of the measure profess to believe that by imposing a so-called transaction tax scheme, which is only another name for a pyramided sales tax, you can eliminate unemployment and bring back prosperity. You cannot increase the purchasing power of the country by taxing consumption. That will not eliminate underconsumption, but will only redistribute the poverty of the Nation. It would be robbing Peter to pay Paul. You cannot make the W. P. A. worker, the day laborer, the smallsalaried man, or the tenant farmer or farm owner, now struggling to get along, more prosperous by burdening him with consumption taxes; and anyone who claims that this transaction tax will not reduce the purchasing power of the consumers and purchasers simply has not considered the mechanics of the tax. The record shows that every tax expert called before the committee so testified.

As the gentleman from North Carolina, the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. Doughton] has just said:

This bill will not only impose a new tax but the heaviest tax ever levied in the history of this or any other country. It will impose not only a tax—the heaviest in all history—but it would impose a tax without any reference or regard whatever to ability to pay, and pretending, I say, to promote business recovery. It is also claimed that this bill, if enacted into law, would abolish poverty, would banish the poorhouse, eliminate courts and jails. In other words, it would in effect bring the millenium. some of the modest claims of Dr. Townsend. O, Mr. Chairman, this bill if put into operation would break the legs of industry; it would break the back of agriculture; and it would break the neck of labor. That would be the effect of this unsound, impossible, unworkable, chimerical scheme.

The able chairman pointed out that this tax would give "an enormous advantage to large producers who distribute directly to the consumer, as the total tax payable with respect to any commodity varies with the number of hands through which it passes." It would be of enormous benefit to chain stores and monopolies. The gigantic business concern which produced the raw material, processed it into articles for sale, and sold these commodities direct to the consumer would eliminate the independent producer of agricultural products and raw materials; it would put the independent manufacturer and small-business man out of business as rapidly as the transition from a free competitive system to monopoly could be effected. That was admitted by Dr. Townsend before the Ways and Means Committee when questioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] as is shown by the record of the hearings. Now, few, if any, of these objections can be made to H. R. 11, introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. SHEPPARD] which proposes to raise funds for these old-age benefits upon ability to pay, exempting the small-salaried man and the little producer. I have steadfastly maintained the position that all taxes should be based upon ability to pay and benefits derived from the distribution of the tax money.

To those who vote for this bill when the roll is called because of political expediency, who are faint-hearted and fearful of threats of defeat by the Townsend organization, permit me to say I have met that threat in the past when the Townsend organization was in its ascendancy. I did not run from the issue then and I shall not do so now nor in the future. I do not consider Dr. Townsend inspired or invincible. You will recall that in 1936 he told us: "Anybody but Roosevelt." He conspired and cooperated with the forces of reaction which sought desperately to repudiate our great President and his program in 1936. I cannot follow blindly a man who keeps such political company. No true friend of President Roosevelt or sincere believer in the principles of the Democratic Party can consistently follow the Republican Dr. Townsend.

Mr. Chairman, when this Townsend monstrosity, this visionary scheme, is overwhelmingly defeated by this House, which all admit will be done, it should clear the atmosphere and permit some real practical and constructive legislation for the benefit of the millions of deserving old people of this country. It is my earnest plea and sincere hope that all those interested in securing worth-while results for the aged, during the present session, get together and present to this Congress a sane, sound pension program, a program that will meet with the approval of both Houses of Congress, a program that actually can and will be enacted into law. Such a program will be a god-send to our needy and suffering old people and I feel confident will meet with the approval of the average citizen and taxpayer.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS].

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, I am tired from having worked about 8 weeks to bring this bill before the House of Representatives for a vote, but I am happy in the realization that I have kept a promise to my people. There have been many bitter things said in the House this afternoon, and I sincerely hope that whatever regard you may have for anyone else, you will realize no matter what you may have said on this floor I have not taken any offense. I, being a sentimental cuss, would rather have the respect and affection of the Members of this House than have anyone entertain any other feeling toward me.

Mr. Chairman, I thought that all debate on this bill would end today and that we would be on equal terms, but I understand now that both sides have reserved a speaker for tomorrow morning. I first thought I would refuse time this evening, but I think now I shall take it because I have some things to say that I believe some Members may want to read during the night or in the morning.

There are one or two things I want to answer. As a matter of fact, there are only one or two things that have been said which I think deserve an answer. We spent a great deal of time this afternoon trying to prove that each other was a bit crazy. When someone tells me I am crazy, I am reminded of a statement made by the eminent psychologist, Henry James. He stated: "There is really no sharp line of demarcation between the sane and the insane."

Mr. Chairman, two things were said to which I would like to give a brief answer. One of them was the mention of the Bell investigating committee and the results of that investigation. I do not know what this Congress thinks, but I know what I think, and I believe that the Nation has come to the conclusion that the final result of that investigation was that $35,000 of the taxpayers' money has been spent and that an old man has been held in contempt of the committee, sentenced to jail, then given a Presidential pardon. I think that is the result of the Bell investigation.

Mr. Chairman, it has been pointed out to us today that every economist who appeared before the committee condemned this plan. I want to challenge any Member of this House to read the testimony of the economists who appeared before this committee and testified on this bill and find where any two of them agreed on a single thing except a general conclusion. They knew nothing about how much the bill will bring in, or what the tax will do, or whether it will improve business. They only came to the conclusion that this is a bad bill. The economists are classed as experts, and let me say something here about experts.

Back in the 1830's some bold spirit predicted that a steamship capable of crossing the Atlantic under its own power could be built. This was a challenge to one Dr. L. A. Lardner, B. A., M. A., LL. B., LL. D. He sat right down and wrote a long article about the rash prediction. You can see it in any library that possesses the Edinburgh Review for 1837. It ran to $25\frac{1}{2}$ close-printed pages. And it proved minutely and in detail by all the laws of physics, mechanics, and thermodynamics that the idea of a ship's crossing the Atlantic under steam was just plain silly.

It was a beautiful essay, and it was printed in ample time to be brought to America in the Sirius, the first ship to cross the Atlantic under steam.

Dr. Lardner was not the only expert that was wrong. Others shook their heads over railroads, declaring that at the terrific speed of 35 miles per hour passengers would be suffocated, and German scientists added that such giddy velocities would put people's insides out of order.

When Col. John Stevens proposed a railroad instead of the Erie Canal he was scornfully laughed at. Those who laughed at him a few years later were to see that canal all but put out of business by railroads.

"Yes—but!" says the expert who is out to prove you wrong. "That was in the old days. We do not guess now. We know better."

Since when? One of the queer things about the experts is that sometimes they know just enough to be spectacularly wrong. Experts had the man who invented photography placed in an insane asylum.

It was the experts who said in 1894 that the horseless carriage was only for the rich and would never come in as common use as the bicycle. It was one of the most distinguished physicists who said in 1903, "The example of the birds does not prove that man can fly." Exactly 2 weeks after he had advised against an attempt to fly two mechanics by the name of Wright sailed off the ground in the first successful airplane flight.

One of the very greatest and most able inventors proved how wrong a great man can be when in 1926 Thomas A. Edison gave it as his considered opinion that talking pictures would never come into general use "because the public will not support them."

Charles F. Kettering, head of the General Motors research laboratory, a distinguished inventor in his own right, had many rebuffs. In the course of his early search for a hard, quick-drying automobile finish to replace the old varnish process that took 37 days, he was rebuffed by a committee of paint experts who told him with withering scorn that the time might be reduced to 34 days but not less. Nature, they said, fixed the length of drying.

Eventually, Nature was persuaded to do the job in less than an hour but not by the experts. "Any time you want to stop a new thing quickly," says Kettering, "get a bunch of experts together. Just call a conference. They all vote that you cannot do it."

Mr. Chairman, I want the Members to read the statement that Dr. Townsend asked me to convey to the Members of this House this morning. I understand there will be a motion to recommit. I want to say that any vote cast in favor of a motion to recommit will be considered as a vote against this bill. I ask you to turn to his statement that I read to you this afternoon.

Mr. Chairman, I have this to say to all Members of the House, whether they be Democrat or Republican:

Some years ago this plan was laughed on the floor and laughed down with 30 votes. There is some indication that it was laughed on the floor this time and also some indication that there will be an attempt to laugh it down but you cannot laugh at the principles involved in the plan, and unless I miss my guess, when the next election rolls around there are many Members of this House who will find it very difficult to laugh it off.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SMITH of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6466) to provide for and promote the general welfare of the United States by supplying to the people a more liberal distribution and increase of purchasing power, retiring certain citizens from gainful employment, improving and stabilizing gainful employment for other citizens, stimulating agricultural and industrial production and general business, and alleviating the hazards and insecurity of old age and unemployment; to provide a method whereby citizens shall contribute to the purchase of and receive a retirement annuity; to provide for the raising of the necessary revenue to operate a continuing plan therefor; to provide for the appropriation and expenditure of such revenue; to provide for the proper administration of this act; to provide penalties for violation of the act; and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 205, he reported the same back to the House.

THE LATE SENATOR HUEY P. LONG

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes,

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, the name of the late Senator Huey P. Long has been brought into this debate by my colleague from the State of Idaho [Mr. White]. Apparently I do not agree with this gentleman in his estimate and appraisal of my late friend Huey Long, and since he is not here to speak for himself I desire to say these few words to sum up, in my opinion, Senator Long's views as to an old-age pension.

Huey Long was one of the most outstanding men who have ever served in the United States Senate. His zeal and work in behalf of the old people of the Nation is well known to everybody, as is the fact that he was one of the first men in public life to ever espouse the cause of an adequate and fair pension to the old people of this country. The program of Senator Long in this respect was not crackpot or unsound. It was well-balanced, businesslike, and deserves emulation.

It now appears that the Townsend bill, being H. R. 6466, is now headed for certain defeat, and since this is the case, speaking as a man who appreciated the outstanding ability and great heart of the late Senator from Louisiana, it is my hope that the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives will not let this session die without bringing in an adequate pension to take care of our old people. It is my hope that this bill will provide a pension which, on the one hand, the United States Government can afford, and, on the other hand, which will adequately and properly support those people who have reached the sunset of life and who need assistance. This pension should be paid entirely by the Federal Government and no one should be required to sign a pauper's oath in order to be entitled to some assistance under our humanitarian plan of taking care of the old people of the United States.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will not object to the gentleman from Idaho speaking, but, of course, it is very late and I will object to any other requests to speak this evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that my remarks concerning the late Huey Long were misunderstood. I may state that I was born in the State of Louisiana; and, further, that I was born on the site of the present Capitol of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. Speaker, I am a great admirer of the late Huey Long. I yield to no man from the State of Louisiana in my respect for the Honorable Huey Long; and I suggest that my colleagues from the great State of Louisiana read the Record in the morning to see just what my remarks were about Huey Long.

I said that Huey Long was one of the greatest humanitarians, that he favored a national old-age pension; and I believe I drew a distinction between Huey Long and the gentleman who spoke and put on a show here this afternoon. If my remarks have been misunderstood and my intention misinterpreted I make this apology, because I regard Huey Long as a great statesman who did a great and lasting service for the people of Louisiana and brought them benefits wrung from the hands of the oppressors—benefits they are enjoying today and will for all time to come. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. Sabath, for 5 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. Barton (at the request of Mr. Martin of Massachusetts), for 1 week, on account of death in family.

To Mr. Gehrmann (at the request of Mr. Hill) on account of serious illness of his daughter in Wisconsin.

To Mr. Darden, for Thursday, June 1, on account of an engagement made 2 months ago, to take part in the launching of the destroyers Morris and Wainwright at the Norfolk Navy Yard at noon on June 1.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings under which the remarks of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Massingale], in reference to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Mapes], were taken down may be deleted from the Record and that the gentleman from Oklahoma may have the right to revise and extend his own remarks.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this request made with the approval of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Mapes] and the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. RAYBURN. Certainly; ctherwise I would not have submitted the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JUNE 1, 1939

(Legislative day of Wednesday, May 31, 1939)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Z@Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O holy and merciful God, our Heavenly Father, who art the refuge of Thy children in every time of need: Hear us as we pray to Thee for guidance in all the experiences and circumstances of the ensuing day. Give us a strong sense of the mystery, wonder, and beauty of life, that, by our intuition, we may lay hold of the invisible world surrounding us and feel Thy constant presence encompassing us. Make us generous in thought, word, and deed; calm in judgment, refined in discernment; serene and gentle in our attitude toward others.

Give wings to our hopes and rest to our fears that, as children of Thy love, we may put away all pretense and meet each other face to face without pride or prejudice. Finally, grant that, our lives being free from waste, we may be unfretted by rebellion against Thy will, unsoiled by thought of self, purified by love of our fellow man, and ennobled by devotion to our country and the establishment of Thy kingdom here on earth. We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ, Thy Son, our Lord. Amen.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I present for proper disposition two memorials from the Legislature of the State of California, the first relative to the baneful effects of a reciprocal trade agreement between the United States of America and Venezuela, and the second relative to shipbuilding facilities on the Pacific coast. I ask that the memorials be appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorials presented by the Senator from California will be received, printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred.

To the Committee on Finance:

Senate Joint Resolution 9

Relative to the baneful effects of a reciprocal-trade agreement between the United States of America and Venezuela

Whereas a reciprocal-trade agreement between the United States of America and Venezuela is contemplated and is being considered and hearings have been held before the Committee for Reciprocity Information pursuant to governmental sanction for the purpose of accumulating data and information for the guidance of the committee charged with the drafting of said proposed agreement;

whereas it appears from the data and information collected as a result of hearings held, the principal subject of the proposed reciprocal-trade agreements shall be the importation of crude oil or derivatives manufactured therefrom into the United States of America, produced in the sovereignty of Venezuela and the reduction of already inadequate excise taxes and tariffs thereon; and Whereas there is a great plethora of oil produced in the State of California and other States of the United States of America far beyond demands in either foreign or domestic markets, which is beyond demands in either foreign or domestic markets, which is causing great distress in the petroleum industry and economic waste to this State and the Nation; that said conditions have stifled initiative, discouraged further discoveries and sterilized investments generally throughout the United States in the petro-investments generally throughout the United States in the petroleum industry; and

Whereas in the State of California the distress caused by the overproduction of oil is particularly acute and a constant threat to the well-being and soundness of the industry and the people at large, so that any graduation of tariff or tax on the importation of foreign oil would not only aggravate such distress by encouraging additional importations with attending competition to California oil but would be followed by chaos, causing bankruptcy of the industry and those directly or indirectly affected thereby, including the State itself; and

Whereas California in particular is now adversely affected by the present inadequate tariffs and excise taxes enjoyed by importers of foreign oils to the extent that it has suffered a great diminution of markets throughout the United States and practical deprivation of its former great market, the eastern seaboard of the United States of America by reason of the importation of foreign oils uniquely related by similar characteristics to the oil produced in

States of America by reason of the importation of foreign oils uniquely related by similar characteristics to the oil produced in the State of California; and

Whereas by reason of reciprocal-trade agreements and the inclusion of the most-favored-nation clause in said agreements, a reciprocal-trade agreement made with Venezuela subjecting petroleum or its derivatives to graduated tariffs or decreased excise taxes would be applicable and available equally to all other oil producing nations enjoying reciprocal-trade agreements with the United States, thereby permitting the indiscriminate dumping of foreign oil on an already surfeited domestic market of the United States under the same provisions as would be accorded Venezuela under the proposed reciprocal-trade agreement; and

Whereas prudence dictates that our State and National defense be strengthened by the development of domestic resources as a measure of preparedness for war; the dumping of foreign oil on the domestic market would not only discourage and stifle domestic development but would encourage development of oil reserves in foreign countries that would become weapons in inimical hands in times of conflict; and not only endanger the billions of dollars invested in California oil fields and the facilities installed to treat, handle, and market the same but labor and the whole economic structure of the State and the Nation itself would be deleteriously affected thereby. and the Nation itself would be deleteriously affected thereby. Any impetus given to the importation of foreign oil not only affects domestic, economic, and social conditions of those actively engaged in the industry but likewise affects the financial and national ability to obtain required money from taxation. Oil produced in foreign countries is uniformly carried in foreign bottoms to the detriment of American shipping, shipbuilding, and American labor otherwise employable in that industry. It affords a stimulus for the employment of cheap foreign labor and an incentive for the building of foreign ships for transportation that become auxiliaries to foreign navies in times of war, creating not only a pronounced threat to our own Navy and the national defense but an incentive for potential belligerents to establish shippards, fabricate tankers that may become auxiliaries to potentially inimical navies, to the detriment of our own nationals: Now, therefore, be it Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California jointly, That the Congress of the United States of America be memorialized to enact legislation particularly exempting from, and prohibiting the inclusion of crude oil produced in a foreign country, or any derivative manufactured from crude oil produced in a foreign country, to come within the purview of any treaty or trade agreement between the United States of America and any foreign country, which would in any manner, directly or indirectly, influence or encourage or condone the importation of crude oil produced in a foreign country, or any derivative manufactured from such crude oil, into the United States of America or any territory or dependency thereof; and be it further territory or dependency thereof, or to prevent and prohibit entirely and effectually by way of embargo, the importation of oil produced in foreign countries, or derivatives manufactured from oil produced in foreign countries into the United States of America, or any territory or dependency thereof, for any purpose whatsoever; and be it further

Whereas any graduation of tariff or decrease in excise tax would not only endanger the billions of dollars invested in California oil fields and the feellities installed to treat handle and market the

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States of America be further memorialized to enact legislation either to increase substantially the current tariff or excise tax on the importation of oil produced in foreign countries and derivatives manufactured therefrom and imported into the United States of America, or any territory or dependency thereof, or to prevent and prohibit entirely and effectivelly. We want of emberge the importation of all produced.

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be transmitted by the secretary of state of the State of California to the President of the United States of America; to the Secretary of State of the United States of America, the Secretary of the Senate of the United States of America, the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, and each Senator and each Member of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, and to the "committee on reciprocity information," and that they are respectfully urged to accomplish the purpose of this memorial.

To the Committee on Commerce:

Senate Joint Resolution 5

Relative to shipbuiding facilities on the Pacific coast

Whereas the development of a merchant marine is requisite to the furtherance of the commercial prosperity of the Nation; and Whereas provision for an adequate merchant marine fleet is an

Whereas provision for an adequate herchant marine neet is an indispensable part of a program for the national defense; and Whereas the immediate development of a merchant marine fleet commensurate with the defensive and commercial needs of the Nation is a matter of great concern to the people of California;

Whereas the development of a merchant marine fleet capable of serving the needs of the coast area is dependent upon the existence on the Pacific coast of adequate shipbuilding facilities; and

Whereas the Maritime Commission has recently recognized the exigent need for adequate shipbuilding facilities on the Pacific coast and has awarded to a Pacific coast firm a contract for the building of two freighters: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the President of the United States be memorialized to include in the Federal Budget for the ensuing year provision for additional and increased development of shipbuilding facilities on the Pacific coast; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of the State of California is hereby requested to transmit a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. LODGE presented a resolution of Local No. 21, National Leather Workers' Association, of Peabody, Mass., in regard to technological unemployment, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Hemphill, chairman, Norton, Kans., remonstrating against the enactment of pending legislation to admit refugee children from Germany into the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition, numerously signed, by farmers of Ellis County, Kans., praying for the continuance of a Federal farm program embodying (1) a self-financed program, (2) marketing quota set up in bushels on each farm for its fair share of the domestic consumption, and (3) parity price for domestic consumption and world price for the remainder, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

TREATY OBSERVANCE AND RESTRICTIONS ON EXPORTS

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I ask consent to introduce a joint resolution for appropriate reference, and also in connection with the joint resolution I request leave to print a short statement in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 143) to provide for retaining in the United States, and denying export therefrom, articles or materials to be used in violation of the sovereignty, independence, or territorial or administrative integrity of any nation, contrary to the treaty engagements of the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The statement presented by Mr. Schwellenbach is as follows:

The purpose of my joint resolution is to withdraw us from participation in the assault being made on China's sovereignty and independence, which we are obligated by the nine-power pact or treaty to respect.

Two features of the resolution serve to exempt it from classification as an embargo against any particular nation. It is general in its scope, and the restrictions on exports are premised on our own treaty observance and in conservation of our resources for purposes of national defense.

Precedents for the fundamental features of the resolution are to be found in existing laws.

The resolution is not an attempt to regulate the conduct of any other nation or people. It is therefore nonwar provocative. I take it, however, that even with rulers running riot in other parts of the world and recklessly tearing treaties asunder, there is still left to us the right to regulate our own conduct.

LXXXIV-409

This my resolution proposes to do, and to regulate it along lines of treaty observance and world-peace assurance, and on principles of Christianity and morality.

Its adoption would also be a major contribution to the preservation of the open-door trade policy for the Orient.

INVESTIGATION OF ECONOMIC AND INDUSTRIAL CONDITIONS IN PUERTO RICO

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I submit a concurrent resolution and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs. The resolution asks for the appointment of a special joint committee to make a complete study and investigation of economic and industrial conditions in Puerto Rico.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 18) was read and referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a special joint committee of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation of economic and industrial conditions in Puerto Rico, with a particular view to determining the effect upon Puerto Rico of the Sugar Act of 1937, the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, and foreign-trade agreements entered into pursuant to the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act of 1934. The special joint committee shall select a chairman from among its members, and shall report to the Congress at the earliest practicable time the results of its study gress at the earliest practicable time the results of its study and investigation, together with its recommendations. For the purposes of this resolution the special joint committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Seventy-sixth and succeeding Congresses, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $5,000, shall be paid one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate, and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, upon vouchers experienced by the chairman approved by the chairman.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a day or two ago I called attention to the rather serious economic situation in Puerto Rico. I referred during the course of my remarks to resolutions which had been adopted by a large organization devoted to the amelioration of the economic conditions in the island. I received information to the effect that tens of thousands of persons had been thrown out of employment, in part due to the Federal wage and hour law which was being enforced in Puerto Rico. The economic organization to which I have referred stated that within a short time 300,000 persons in Puerto Rico would be on relief, and that the policies which were now being pursued by the Federal Government were bound to be increasingly disadvantageous to the economic and industrial life of the people.

Since then I have received a concurrent resolution, adopted by the Legislature of Puerto Rico. It was unanimously approved by the Puerto Rican Senate on the 10th of April of this year, and by the House of Representatives on the 14th of April.

The resolution directs attention to the very serious economic condition of the island, and refers to various measures passed by the Federal Government which have proven harmful to Puerto Rico economies.

I have visited Puerto Rico and am reasonably familiar with political and economic conditions of the island. I believe that the resolutions of the economic organization to which I have referred, as well as the resolution which I am now offering for the RECORD, call for some action by the Congress. I have conferred with a number of Senators who are more or less familiar with conditions prevailing in Puerto Rico, and they concur in the proposal that a joint committee of the Senate and the House be appointed and authorized to make a full and complete study and investigation of the economic and industrial conditions of the island.

I ask that the resolution adopted by the Legislature of Puerto Rico be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. In making this request I do not wish it to be understood that I agree to all the statements contained in the resolution. However, the views of the Legislature of Puerto Rico are entitled to serious and full consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so or-

The concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of Puerto Rico is as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 9

Concurrent resolution to set forth the very acute crisis now experienced by the island of Puerto Rico; to make urgent demands upon the President of the United States of America and the national administration for a remedy for this situation

Whereas the exports of Puerto Rico have fallen from $114,953,827 in 1937 to $62,077,178 in 1938, i. e., a decrease of 23.5 percent. In 1938 imports amounted to $93,314,783, which showed a trade balance against Puerto Rico of $11,237,605 in the year 1938; Whereas, due to the restrictions resulting from the quotas assigned to Puerto Rico for this year, there can be no new plantings of sugarcane, the sugar-grinding season will close in May, it being one of the shortest there has ever been in Puerto Rico, and at the close of the grinding season there will be over 200,000 laborers out of work; Whereas, Whereas, according to reports of the administrator of the P. R. R. A., the number of cases certified for relief reached 222,606

P. K. K. A., the number of cases certified for relief reached 222,606 unemployed in November 1938, a figure which represents, counting their dependents, 1,121,035 persons without means of subsistence; Whereas Puerto Rico has suffered considerable reductions in the export values of its agricultural products during the year 1938 as compared with 1937, reductions which are distributed approximately as follows: Sugar, $21,240,000; coffee, $1,059,000; tobacco, $1,631,000; fruits, $691,000; needlework, $9,199,000;

Whereas in accordance with the agreement entered into with Cuba on September 3, 1934, by virtue of which the tariff on canned and fresh pineapples was reduced, the Republic of Cuba bound and fresh pineapples was reduced, the Republic of Cuba bound itself to furnish seeds to Puerto Rico, an obligation which it has refused to perform, thus violating the conditions of said treaty;

Whereas these reductions (with the exception of coffee) have all been due directly to acts, both legislative and administrative, of the National Government, to wit:

(a) Sugar Act of 1937, which in the distribution of quotas allots to Puerto Rico a ratio of only 11.94 percent out of the total estimated consumption of the Nation;

(b) The Wage and Hour Act, which prescribes wages at a rate that the most important of the industries affected cannot withstand;

stand;
(c) Trade agreement with France whereby the duty on bay oil was reduced from 25 percent to 12½ percent, which caused our sales of this oil to the United States to drop from $29,181 in 1937 to $17,223 in 1938;

(d) Trade agreement with Cuba, dated September 3, 1934, reducing the duty on cigars from $3.60 a pound, plus 20 percent ad valorem, to $2.25 a pound, plus 12½ percent ad valorem, which caused a drop from $1.453,340 in 1934 to $42,813 in 1938 in the value of Puerto Rican cigars in the United States;

value of Puerto Rican cigars in the United States;

(e) Trade agreement with the United Kingdom, dated January
1, 1939, reducing the duty on coconuts from $5 a thousand to $2.50 a thousand, which reduction is likewise applicable to coconuts imported from Panama, Colombia, Venezuela, Cuba, and Santo Domingo, under the most-favored-nation clause in their commercial treaties with the United States, which has resulted in such a drop in the price of coconuts that it is hardly worth while to ship them:

to ship them;
(f) Trade agreements with El Salvador, Guatemala, and Canada, dated May 31, 1937; June 15, 1938; and January 1, 1939, reducing the import duty on honey from $0.03 to $0.02 a pound, for which reason the sales of honey from Puerto Rico in the United States have dropped from $75,175 in 1936 to $47,924 in 1938;

(g) Trade agreement with Switzerland, dated December 15, 1936, which, on pages 375-410, reads as follows: Handkerchiefs, wholly or in part of machine-made lace; handkerchiefs embroidered (whether with a plain or fancy initial, monogram, or otherwise, and whether or not the embroidery is on a scalloped edge), tamboured, appliqued, or from which threads have been omitted, drawn, punched, or cut, and with threads introduced after weaving drawn, punched, or cut, and with threads introduced after weaving to finish or ornament the openwork, not including one row of straight hemstitching adjoining the hem; any of the foregoing, finished or unfinished, which contain no hand-made lace and which is not embroidered or tamboured in any part by hand: Composed wholly or in chief value of cotton, 2 cents each and 30 percent ad valorem. Composed wholly or in chief value of vegetable fiber other than cotton: If finished and valued at 80 cents or more per dozen, 2 cents each and 30 percent ad valorem; if unhemmed and without any finished edge, and valued at 45 cents or more per dozen, 2 cents each and 30 percent ad valorem.

"The Treasury Department decided that, inasmuch as paragraph 1529 (b) above cited, specifically exempts only handkerchiefs which are not embroidered or tamboured in any part by hand, but does not specifically exempt other hand-made ornaments such as applique, works from which threads have been omitted, etc., handkerchiefs on which such handwork has been done shall be included under the new tariff rate of the treaty."

The above did not favor Switzerland but instead favored China, which totally invaded the handkerchief market of the United States to the detriment of the handkerchiefs market of Puerto Rico.

(h) Competition with China, the Philippines, Portugal, Japan, Italy, and Madeira, subject to this tariff under the most-favored-nation clause caused a drop in the value of our sales of needle-work to the United States from $20,811,000 in 1937 to $11,612,000 in 1938; this when the wage rates fixed by the National Wage and Hour Act were still to be prescribed;

(i) Trade agreement with Cuba, of September 3, 1934, lowering the tariff on cucumbers, peppers, canned and fresh pineapples, as follows: Cucumbers, from $0.024 a pound to $0.012 a pound; peppers, from $0.02 a pound to $0.015 a pound; canned pineapples, from $0.016 a pound to $0.008 a pound; fresh pineapples, from $0.016 a pound to $0.008 a pound; fresh pineapples, from $0.40 a crate to $0.20 a crate. These reductions in the tariff on cucumbers and peppers are aggravated by the fact that such reductions are effective from December 1 to the last day of the following February in the case of cucumbers, and from January 1 to April 30 in the case of peppers, and it is between these dates for which the reduction has been granted that Puerto Rico ships these products to the tion has been granted that Puerto Rico ships these products to the case of peppers, and it is between these dates for which the reduction has been granted that Puerto Rico ships these products to the Continent, when the other producing areas of the Nation have finished selling their crops, thus giving the advantage to Cuba exclusively at the expense of Puerto Rico, while complete protection is afforded to the other producing areas of the continent. As a result, the sale of Puerto Rican cucumbers to the United States has dropped from 2,923,230 pounds in 1935 to 2,562,450 pounds in 1938; and sales of peppers have dropped from 149,845 pounds in 1935 to 78,255 pounds in 1938. Even though this reduction is not of the greatest significance, it is important, however, that a business which, if it enjoyed adequate protection, could increase in importance and perhaps become a leading factor in our sources of wealth, has been brought to a standstill;

(j) As regards fresh pineapples, the agreement with Cuba will practically do away with the cultivation of this fruit in Puerto Rico, considering that Cuban exports of fresh pineapples to the United States have increased from 52.7 percent of the total pineapple imports in 1935 to 55.4 percent in 1936 and 64.6 percent in 1937, while Puerto Rican shipments decreased during the same period from 34.2 percent in 1936 to 28.3 percent in 1937. As a result of competition, furthermore, prices dropped from $2.66 a case in the New York market in 1935 to $2.47 a case in 1936, to $2.24 a case in 1937, and to $1.94 a case in 1938, and the prices on canned pineapples likewise dropped from $0.666 a pound in 1935 to $0.064 a pound in 1936, to $0.066 a pound in 1938; and the whole situation is now further aggravated by the fact that the canning and packing of pineapples for the market is now made enormously expensive through the application of the Wage and Hour Act. Agreements similar to that made with Cuba in regard to pineapples, made with Honduras, Gaute-

the market is now made enormously expensive through the application of the Wage and Hour Act. Agreements similar to that made with Cuba in regard to pineapples, made with Honduras, Gautemala, Haiti, and Costa Rica, have reduced the duty on fresh pineapples from $0.50 a crate to $0.35 a crate, and the agreement with the United Kingdom of England dated January 1, 1939, now also fixes the duty at $0.35 a crate;

(k) Trade agreement with Cuba (September 3, 1934) and Haiti (June 3, 1935) reducing the duty on rum from $4 to $2 a gallon in the case of Cuba and from $5 to $2.50 a gallon in the case of Haiti. Through these concessions the expansion of our liquor industry has necessarily been checked, which, with the effective protection previously enjoyed, cculd have developed into a source of income of almost as much consequence as the sugar industry;

(l) Trade agreement of September 3, 1934, with Cuba, making reductions in the duty on unstripped tobacco; agreement of February 1, 1936, with Holland, lowering the duty on cigar wrappers; agreement of January 1, 1939, with the United Kingdom, lowering the duty on cut tobacco; agreement of September 3, 1934, with the duty on cut tobacco; agreement of September 3, 1934, with Cuba, lowering the duty on fresh tomatoes and grapefruit, all of them to the grave injury of the price of our tobacco, our

of them to the grave injury of the price of our topacco, our tomatoes, and our grapefruit;

(m) Trade agreement of June 15, 1936, with France, lowering the duty on vanilla from $0.30 a pound to $0.15 a pound, a reduction which deprives Puerto Rico of the protection offered to this product, the cultivation of which was being promoted for the purpose of creating the vanilla industry, in view of the fact that Puerto Rico needs diversification of agriculture and the development of new industries;

(n) Under the security offered by a protective tariff of $0.02 a pound, we essayed the promotion of the planting and cultivation of citron as a suitable crop to supplement the coffee crop in the interior citron as a suitable crop to supplement the coffee crop in the interior of the island. It grew well, and the cultivation of this crop acquired ever greater importance; but the Congress of the United States removed the tariff, and now, selling at prices of 3 and 4 cents a pound in the New York market, Italy with great strides displaces Puerto Rican producers, who cannot compete at these prices, for in Italy this product is salted with sea water and lower wages are paid, and, in addition, the Government subsidizes producers;

(o) The exportation of manganese, the only mineral that we mined on a commercial scale, has had to be stopped because Congress took away the tariff protection it previously enjoyed;

Whereas the Department of State now proposes to lower the

Whereas the Department of State now proposes to lower the duty on Cuban sugar from $0.90 to $0.75 a hundredweight, according to a notice dated November 30, 1938, and this will be another blow aimed at our economy and affecting our chief agricultural product, inasmuch as the mere announcement of the reduction in the duty brought the prices down, which forced the Secretary of Agriculture to cut down on his estimate of consumption for the purpose of maintaining prices, which will work fresh injury on us, inasmuch as the market quota originally allotted to us will have to be cut down in proportion; as the market quota originally allotted to us will have to be cut down in proportion;

Whereas, in making the agreement with Czechoslovakia, Puerto Rican coffee did not receive adequate consideration and was allotted a minimum quota smaller than that of any of the other countries that seil coffee in that market, despite the fact that Czechoslovakian coffee importers are desirous of buying it, and such action has prevented the increased importation of Puerto Rican coffee;

Whereas the application of the provisions of the Sugar Act of 1937 has reduced the income derived from sugar out of all proportion to the needs of the country and has injured the interests of the producers and laborers of Puerto Rico, a situation made worse through the discrimination of which Puerto Rico has been made a victim; for while continental areas have had the benefit of quotas which represented no reduction of their normal crops, while neither Hawaii nor the Philippines have filled the quotas allotted to them, while Cuba is allotted a quota twice as large as that allotted to Puerto Rico, and Puerto Rico has always filled its quota to excess, our island is allotted a grinding quota for 1939 that amounts to a restriction of 21.5 percent on its 1938 production, which totaled 1,077,128 tons, notwithstanding the fact that sugar is the foundation of our economy, the mother industry on which we depend for paying wages to 150,000 of our laborers;

Whereas it will not be allowed during this year 1939 to manufacture sugar in excess of the quota assigned for the continental market and consumption in the island, which will mean a difference of 108,139 tons less sugar manufactured by us this year, and for this reason the erinding season will last 3 months only, and suffi-
